

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

recat. MANY people think they can discern a novelist's real opinions in his works, and, of course, when he speaks in his own person, they can. But surely the dialogue of fictitious characters must be an unsafe guide to an author's real mind; for it is the writer's business to make his characters deliver their convictions, not his, and as eloquently as possible. My good friend, Mr. Chatto, has thought it worth while to ransack the files for my personal convictions on various subjects and to publish them. In this he has consulted friendship rather than interest. However, honest and lasting convictions are worth something, and this volume contains nothing else.

I find I have gone a little beyond the mark in calling the execution of Murdoch illegal. It is not prima facie illegal to hang a man who kills an officer in the discharge of his duty, but in this country law goes by precedent; Murdoch garrotted the gaoler, not with the intention of killing him, but of escaping whilst the gaoler was disabled for a time. The desire for liberty is as natural and overpowering as hunger, and the prisoner acted upon it with no murderous intention whatever. He never left the neighbourhood, sure proof he did not know he had killed the gaoler, and he went into tears when he heard the old man was dead. The people who at that date misgoverned this nation had tempted Murdoch to the act by leaving Hastings Gaol inefficiently guarded. When they hung the youth they had tempted,—hung him to hide their own fault,—the spectators of the execution were fewer than ever assembled to see a hanging before or since, and the only cry that came from this handful of spectators was, “Murder! Murder!!” Just three months after this butchery, an escaped prisoner was brought before a judge: the judge was invited by the crown to inflict condign punishment; he treated the proposal with contempt. “The prisoner,” said he, “yielded to the natural and imperious desire of liberty. It was his business to escape, and it was the gaoler’s business not to let him.”

In two other matters I said too little. Colonel Baker’s sentence was beyond all precedent, and the verdict hardly justified. In a court that defies the Divine law, and the laws of civilized Europe, by closing the mouth of the accused, every admission made by the prosecutor ought to have double weight. When a young lady orders a gallant colonel to hold her whilst she projects from a railway carriage, he is her ally in a gymnastic, not an assailant she really fears, or has grave reason to fear. Quodcunque ostendis mihi sic incredulus odi. The other example in which I have written below the mark, is the verdict of wilful murder against Louis Staunton, Mrs. Patrick Staunton, and Alice Rhodes: a verdict bloodthirsty yet ridiculous, a verdict obtained by transparent perjury in the witness-box, and prejudice, sophistry, and bad law upon the bench.

But this latter shortcoming I hope to repair, with God’s help, before the two victims of perjury, sophistry, false fact, and rotten law, are slaughtered in the bloodless but effectual shambles, where the one real criminal has already perished.

THE BOX TUNNEL.

A Fact.

THE 10-15 train glided from Paddington, May 7, 1847. In the left compartment of a certain first-class carriage were four passengers; of these, two were worth description. The lady had a smooth, white, delicate brow, strongly marked eyebrows, long lashes, eyes that seemed to change colour, and a good-sized delicious mouth, with teeth as white as milk. A man could not see her nose for her eyes and mouth: her own sex could and would have told us some nonsense about it. She wore an unpretending greyish dress, buttoned to the throat, with lozenge-shaped buttons, and a Scotch shawl that agreeably evaded the responsibility of colour. She was like a duck, so tight her plain feathers fitted her; and there she sat, smooth, snug, and delicious, with a book in her hand and a souppçon of her snowy wrist just visible as she held it. Her opposite neighbour was what I call a good style of man,—the more to his credit, since he belonged to a corporation, that frequently turns out the worst imaginable style of young man. He was a cavalry officer, aged twenty-five. He had a moustache, but not a repulsive one; not one of those sub-nasal pig-tails, on which soup is suspended like dew on a shrub; it was short, thick, and black as a coal. His teeth had not yet been turned by tobacco smoke to the colour of tobacco juice, his clothes did not stick to nor hang on him, they sat on him; he had an engaging smile, and, what I liked the dog for, his vanity, which was inordinate, was in its proper place, his heart, not in his face, jostling mine and other people's, who have none:—in a word, he was what one oftener hears of than meets, a young gentleman. He was conversing, in an animated whisper, with a companion, a fellow-officer,—they were talking about, what it is far better not to do, women. Our friend clearly did not wish to be overheard, for he cast, ever and anon, a furtive glance at his fair vis-à-vis and lowered his voice. She seemed completely absorbed in her book, and that reassured him. At last the two soldiers came down to a whisper, and in that whisper (the truth must be told) the one who got down at Slough, and was lost to posterity, bet ten pounds to three, that he, who was going down with us to Bath and immortality, would not kiss either of the ladies opposite upon the road. “Done! Done!” Now I am sorry a man I have hitherto praised should have lent himself, even in a whisper, to such a speculation: but “nobody is wise at all hours,” not even when the clock is striking five-and-twenty; and you are to consider his profession, his good looks, and the temptation,—ten to three.

After Slough the party was reduced to three; at Twyford one lady dropped her handkerchief; Captain Dolignan fell on it like a tiger and returned it like a lamb; two or three words were interchanged on that occasion. At Reading the Marlborough of our tale made one of the safe investments of that day; he bought a “Times” and a “Punch”; the latter was full of steel-pen thrusts and wood-cuts. Valour and beauty deigned to laugh at some inflated humbug or other punctured by “Punch.” Now laughing together thaws our human ice; long before Swindon it was a talking match,—at Swindon who so devoted as Captain Dolignan,—he handed them out,—he souped them,—he tough-chickened them,—he brandied and cochinealed * one, and he brandied and burnt-sugared the other; on their return to the carriage one lady passed into the inner compartment to inspect a certain gentleman’s seat on that side the line.

Reader, had it been you or I, the beauty would have been the deserter, the average one would have stayed with us till all was blue, ourselves included; not more surely does our slice of bread and butter, when it escapes from our hand, revolve it ever so often, alight face downwards on the carpet. But this was a bit of a fop, Adonis, dragoon,—so Venus remained in tête-à-tête with him. You have seen a dog meet an unknown female of his species ; how handsome, how empresé, how expressive he becomes ; such was Dolignan after Swindon, and, to do the dog justice, he got handsomer and handsomer ; and you have seen a cat conscious of approaching cream,—such was Miss Haythorn ; she became demurer and demurer : presently our Captain looked out of window and laughed ; this elicited an inquiring look from Miss Haythorn.

* This is supposed to allude to two decoctions called port and sherry, and imagined by one earthly nation to partake of a vinous nature.

“Invariably.”

“What for ?”

“Why !—hem !—it is a gentleman’s joke.”

“O, I don’t mind its being silly, if it makes me laugh.” Captain Dolignan, thus encouraged, recounted to Miss Haythorn the following : “A lady and her husband sat together going through the Box Tunnel,—there was one gentleman opposite ; it was pitch-dark ; after the tunnel the lady said, ‘George, how absurd of you to salute me going through the tunnel !’—‘I did no such thing.’—‘You didn’t ?’—‘No ! why ?’—‘Why, because somehow I thought you did.’” Here Captain Dolignan laughed, and endeavoured to lead his companion to laugh, but it was not to be done. The train entered the tunnel.

Miss Haythorn. “Ah !”

Dolignan. “What is the matter ?”

Miss Haythorn. “I am frightened.”

Dolignan (moving to her side). “Pray do not be alarmed, I am near you.”

Miss Haythorn. “You are near me, very near me indeed, Captain Dolignan.”

Dolignan. “You know my name !”

Miss Haythorn. “I heard your friend mention it. I wish we were out of this dark place.”

Dolignan. “I could be content to spend hours here, reassuring you, sweet lady.”

Miss Haythorn. “Nonsense !”

Dolignan. “Pwcep !” (Grave reader, do not put your lips to the cheek of the next pretty creature you meet, or you will understand what this means.)

Miss Haythorn. “Ee ! Ee ! Ee !”

Friend. “What is the matter ?”

Miss Haythorn. "Open the door!—open the door!"

The door was opened. There was a sound of hurried whispers, the door was shut and the blind pulled down with hostile sharpness.

Miss Haythorn's scream lost a part of its effect because the engine whistled forty thousand murders at the same moment; and fictitious grief makes itself heard when real cannot.

Between the tunnel and Bath our young friend had time to ask himself whether his conduct had been marked by that delicate reserve, which is supposed to distinguish the perfect gentleman.

With a long face, real or feigned, he held open the door,—his late friends attempted to escape on the other side,—impossible! they must pass him. She whom he had insulted (Latin for kissed) deposited somewhere at his foot a look of gentle blushing reproach; the other, whom he had not insulted, darted red-hot daggers at him from her eyes, and so they parted.

It was perhaps fortunate for Dolignan that he had the grace to be friends with Major Hoskyns of his regiment, a veteran laughed at by the youngsters, for the Major was too apt to look coldly upon billiard balls and cigars; he had seen cannon balls and linstocks. He had also, to tell the truth, swallowed a good bit of the mess-room poker, but with it some sort of moral poker, which made it as impossible for Major Hoskyns to descend to an ungentlemanlike word or action as to brush his own trousers below the knee.

Captain Dolignan told this gentleman his story in gleeful accents; but Major Hoskyns heard him coldly, and as coldly answered that he had known a man lose his life for the same thing. "That is nothing," continued the Major, "but unfortunately he deserved to lose it."

At this the blood mounted to the younger man's temples, and his senior added: "I mean to say he was thirty-five; you, I presume, are twenty-one!"

"Twenty-five."

"That is much the same thing. Will you be advised by me?"

"If you will advise me."

"Speak to no one of this, and send White the £3 that he may think you have lost the bet."

"That is hard when I won it."

"Do it for all that, sir."

Let the disbelievers in human perfectibility know that this dragoon capable of a blush did this virtuous action, albeit with violent reluctance: and it was his first damper. A week after these events, he was at a ball. He was in that state of factitious discontent which belongs to us amiable English. He was looking, in vain, for a lady, equal in personal attraction to the idea he had formed of George Dolignan as a man, when suddenly there glided past him a most delightful vision, a lady whose beauty and symmetry took him by the eyes. Another look: "It can't be!—Yes, it is!" Miss Haythorn—(not that he knew her name!)—but what an apotheosis!

The duck had become a pea-hen,—radiant, dazzling; she looked twice as beautiful and almost twice as large as before. He lost sight of her. He found her again. She was so lovely she made him ill,—and he, alone, must not dance with her, nor speak to her. If he had been content to begin her acquaintance in the usual way, it might have ended in kissing, but having begun with kissing it must end in nothing. As she danced, sparks of beauty fell from her on all around, but him,—she did not see him; it was clear she never would see him. One gentleman was particularly assiduous; she smiled on his assiduity; he was ugly, but she smiled on him. Dolignan was surprised at his success, his ill taste, his ugliness, his impertinence. Dolignan at last found himself injured. "Who was this man? and what right had he to go on so? He had never kissed her, I suppose," said Dolly. Dolignan could not prove it, but he felt that, somehow, the rights of property were invaded. He went home and dreamed of Miss Haythorn, and hated all the ugly successful.* He spent a fortnight trying to find out who this beauty was,—he never could encounter her again. At last he heard of her in this way; a lawyer's clerk paid him a little visit and commenced a little action against him, in the name of Miss Haythorn, for insulting her in a railway train.

The young gentleman was shocked; endeavoured to soften the lawyer's clerk; that machine did not thoroughly comprehend the meaning of the term. The lady's name, however, was at last revealed by this untoward incident; from her name to her address was but a short step; and the same day our crestfallen hero lay in wait at her door, and many a succeeding day, without effect. But one fine afternoon she issued forth quite naturally, as if she did it every day, and walked briskly on the nearest Parade. Dolignan did the same, he met and passed her many times on the Parade, and searched for pity in her eyes, but found neither look, nor recognition, nor any other sentiment; for all this she walked and walked, till all the other promenaders were tired and gone,—then her culprit summoned resolution, and taking off his hat, with a voice tremulous for the first time, besought permission to address her. She stopped, blushed, and neither acknowledged nor disowned his acquaintance. He blushed, stammered out how ashamed he was, how he deserved to be punished, how he was punished, how little she knew how unhappy he was; and concluded by begging her not to let all the world know the disgrace of a man who was already mortified enough by the loss of her acquaintance. She asked an explanation; he told her of the action that had been commenced in her name; she gently shrugged her shoulders, and said, “How stupid they are.” Emboldened by this, he begged to know whether or not a life of distant unpretending devotion would, after a lapse of years, erase the memory of his madness,—his crime?

* When our successful rival is ugly the blow is doubly severe, crushing,—we fall by bludgeon: we who thought the keenest rapier might perchance thrust at us in vain,

“She did not know.”

“She must now bid him adieu, as she had some preparations to make for a ball in the Crescent, where everybody was to be.” They parted, and Dolignan determined to be at the ball where everybody was to be. He was there, and after some time he obtained an introduction to Miss Haythorn, and he danced with her. Her manner was gracious. With the wonderful tact of her sex, she seemed to have commenced the acquaintance that evening. That night, for the first time, Dolignan was in love. I will spare the reader all a lover’s arts, by which he succeeded in dining where she dined, in dancing where she danced, in overtaking her by accident when she rode. His devotion followed her even to church, where our dragoon was rewarded by learning there is a world where they neither polk nor smoke,—the two capital abominations of this one.

He made acquaintance with her uncle, who liked him, and he saw at last, with joy, that her eye loved to dwell upon him, when she thought he did not observe her.

It was three months after the Box Tunnel that Captain

Dolignan called one day upon Captain Haythorn, R.N., whom he had met twice in his life, and slightly propitiated by resolutely listening to a cutting-out expedition; he called, and in the usual way asked permission to pay his addresses to his daughter. The worthy Captain straightway began doing Quarter-Deck, when suddenly he was summoned from the apartment by a mysterious message. On his return he announced, with a total change of voice, that, "It was all right, and his visitor might run alongside as soon as he chose." My reader has divined the truth; this nautical commander, terrible to the foe, was in complete and happy subjugation to his daughter, our heroine.

As he was taking leave, Dolignan saw his divinity glide into the drawing-room. He followed her, observed a sweet consciousness which encouraged him; that consciousness deepened into confusion,—she tried to laugh, she cried instead, and then she smiled again; and when he kissed her hand at the door, it was, "George," and "Marian," instead of Captain this, and Miss the other. A reasonable time after this (for my tale is merciful and skips formalities and torturing delays) these two were very happy,—they were once more upon the railroad, going to enjoy the honeymoon all by themselves. Marian Dolignan was dressed just as before,—duck-like, and delicious; all bright except her clothes: but George sat beside her this time instead of opposite; and she drank him in gently from under her long eyelashes. "Marian," said George, "married people should tell each other all. Will you ever forgive me if I own to you—no—"

"Yes! yes!"

"Well, then! you remember the Box Tunnel" (this was the first allusion he had ventured to it), "I am ashamed to say I had bet £3 to £10 with White, I would kiss one of you two ladies;" and George, pathetic externally, chuckled within.

"I know that, George; I overheard you," was the demure reply.

"O, you overheard me?—impossible."

"And did you not hear me whisper to my companion? I made a bet with her."

"You made a bet?—how singular! What was it?"

"Only a pair of gloves, George."

"Yes, I know, but what about?"

"That, if you did, you should be my husband, dearest."

"Oh!—but stay: then you could not have been so very angry with me, love ; why, dearest, then who brought that action against me ? ”

Mrs. Dolignan looked down.

“ I was afraid you were forgetting me. George, you will never forgive me ? ”

“ Sweet angel !—why, here is the Box Tunnel.”

Now reader,—fie !—no ! no such thing ! You can't expect to be indulged in this way every time we come to a dark place. Besides, it is not the thing. Consider ; two sensible married people,—no such phenomenon, I assure you, took place ; no scream issued in hopeless rivalry of the engine—this time.

A BRAVE WOMAN.

THE public itches to hear what people of rank and reputation do and say, however trivial. We defer to this taste: and that gives us a right to gratify our own now and then, by presenting what may be called the reverse picture, the remarkable acts, or sufferings, or qualities, of persons unknown to society, because society is a clique; and to fame, because fame is partial.

In this spirit we shall tell our readers a few facts about a person we are not likely to misjudge, for we do not know her even by sight.

31st of August, 1878, a train left Margate for London by the Chatham and Dover line. At Sittingbourne the pointsman turned the points the wrong way, and the train dashed into a shunted train at full speed. The engine, tender, and leading carriages were crushed together and piled over one another. The nearest passengers were chatting merrily one moment, and dead, dying, or mutilated, the next.

Nearest the engine was a third-class carriage, and in its farthest compartment sat a Mrs. Freeland, who in her youth had led an adventurous life in the colonies, but now in middle age had returned to mother England for peace and quiet. She felt a crash and heard a hissing, and for one moment saw the tender bursting through the compartments towards her; then she was hurled down upon her face, with some awful weight upon her, and wedged immovable in a débris of fractured iron, splintered wood, shattered glass, and mutilated bodies.

In a few minutes people ran to help, but in that excited state which sometimes aggravates these dire calamities. First they were for dragging her out by force; but she was self-possessed, and said: "Pray, be calm and don't attempt it; I am fast by the legs, and a great weight on my back."

Then they were for breaking into the carriage from above: but she called to them, "Please don't do that—the roof is broken, and you don't know what you may bring down upon us."

Thus advised by the person most likely to lose her head one would think, they effected an entrance at the sides. They removed from her back an iron wheel and a dead body, and they sawed round her jammed and lacerated limbs, and at last with difficulty carried out a lady, with her boots torn and filled with blood, her clothes in ribbons, her face pouring blood, her back apparently broken, and her right leg furrowed all down to the very foot with a gaping wound, that laid bare the sinews; besides numberless contusions and smaller injuries. They laid her on a mat upon the platform, and there she remained, refusing many offers of brandy, and waiting for a surgeon.

None came for a long time; and benevolent Nature, so-called, sent a heavy rain. At last, in three quarters of an hour, surgeons arrived, and one of them removed her on her mat into a shed, that let in only part of the rain. He found her spine injured, took a double handful of splinters, wood, and glass, out of her head and face, and then examined her leg. He looked aghast at the awful furrow. The sufferer said, quietly, "I should like a stitch or two put into that." The surgeon looked at her in amazement, "Can you bear it?" She said: "I think so."

He said she had better fortify herself with a little brandy. She objected to that as useless. But he insisted, and the awful furrow was stitched up with silk. This done he told her she had better be moved to the Infirmary at Chatham.

"Army surgeons?" said she. "No, thank you. I shall go to a London hospital."

Being immovable in this resolution, she had to wait three hours for a train.

At last she was sent up to London, lying upon a mat on the floor of a carriage, hashed, as we have described, and soaked with rain. From the London station she was conveyed on a stretcher to St. George's Hospital. There they discovered many grave injuries, admired her for her courage and wisdom in having had her wounded leg sewn up at once, but told her with regret that to be effectual it must be secured with silver points, and that without delay.

"Very well," said she, patiently; "but give me chloroform, for I am worn out."

The surgeon said : " If you could endure it without chloroform it would be better." He saw she had the courage of ten men.

" Well," said she, " let me have somebody's hand to hold, and I will try to bear it."

A sympathizing young surgeon gave this brave woman his hand : and she bore to have the silk threads removed, and thirty little silver skewers passed and repassed through her quivering flesh, sixty wounds to patch up one. It afterwards transpired that the good surgeon was only reserving chloroform for the amputation he thought must follow, having little hope of saving such a leg.

Whatever charity and science—united in our hospitals, though disunited in those dark hells where God's innocent creatures are cut up alive out of curiosity—could do, was done for her at St. George's Hospital ; the wounded leg was saved, and in three weeks the patient was carried home. But the deeper injuries seemed to get worse. She lay six months on her back, and after that was lame and broken and aching from head to foot for nearly a year. As soon as she could crawl about she busied herself in relieving the sick and the poor, according to her means.

Fifteen months after the railway accident, a new and mysterious injury began to show itself ; severe internal pains, accompanied with wasting, which was quite a new feature in the case. This brought her to death's door after all.

But, when faint hopes were entertained of her recovery, the malady declared itself, an abscess in the intestines. It broke, and left the sufferer prostrate, but out of danger.

Unfortunately, in about a month another formed, and laid her low again, until it gave way like its predecessor. And that has now been her life for months ; constantly growing these agonising things, of which a single one is generally fatal.

In one of her short intervals of peace a friend of hers, Major Mercier, represented to her the merits and the difficulties of a certain hospital for diseases of the skin. Instantly this brave woman sets to work and lives for other afflicted persons. She fights the good fight, talks, writes, persuades, insists, obtains the public support of five duchesses, five marchionesses, thirty-two countesses, and a hundred ladies of rank, and also of many celebrated characters ; obtains subscriptions, organises a grand bazaar, etc., for this worthy object,

Now, as a general rule, permanent invalids fall into egotism; but here is a lady, not only an invalid, but a sufferer, and indeed knocked down by suffering half her time; yet with undaunted heart, and charitable, unselfish soul, she struggles and works for others, whose maladies are after all much lighter than her own.

Ought so much misfortune and merit to receive no public notice? Ought so rare an union of male fortitude and womanly pity to suffer and relieve without a word of praise? Why to us, who judge by things, not names, this seems some heroic figure strayed out of Antiquity into an age of little men and women, who howl at the scratch of a pen.

Such a character deserves to be sung by some Christian poet; but as poetasters are many and poets are few, Mrs. Rosa Freeland, brave, suffering and charitable, is chronicled in the prose of "Fact."

A BAD FALL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "FACT."

SIR,—I sometimes get provoked with the British workman—and say so. He comes into my house to do a day's work, and goes out again to fetch the tool he knew he should want, and does not come back till after breakfast. Then I think I have got him. But no; he sharpens his tools and goes out for a whet. Even when he is at work he is always going into the kitchen for hot water, or a hot coal, or the loan of a pair of tongs, or some other blind. My maids, who, before he came, were all industry and mock modesty, throw both these virtues out of window, and are after him on the roof, when he is not after them in the kitchen. They lose their heads entirely, and are not worth their salt, far less their wages, till he is gone, and that is always a terribly long time, considering how little he has to do. For these reasons, and because whenever he has been out on my roof, the rain comes in next heavy shower, I have permitted myself to call him in print "the curse of families."

Then he strikes, and combines, and speechifies, and calls the capital, that feeds him, his enemy; and sometimes fights with the capital of a thousand against the capital of a single master, and overpowers it, yet calls that a fight of labour against capital. Then he demands short time, which generally means more time to drink in, and higher wages, which often means more money to drink with. Thereupon I lose my temper, rush into print, and call the British workman the British talk-man and the British drink-man.

But it must be owned all this is rather narrow and shallow. "Where there's a multitude there's a mixture," and a private gentleman in my position does not really know the mass of the workmen, and their invaluable qualities.

One thing is notorious—that in their bargains with capital they are very lenient in one respect, they charge very little for their lives; yet they shorten them in many trades, and lose them right away in some.

Even I, who have been hard on them in some things, have already pointed out that instead of labour and capital the trades ought to speechify on life, labour, and capital; and dwell more upon their risks, as a fit subject of remuneration, than their professed advocates have done.

Is it not a sad thing to reflect, when you see the scaffolding prepared for some great building to be erected either for pious or mundane purposes, that out of those employed in erecting it some are sure to be killed!

All this prolixity is to usher in a simple fact, which interests me more than the petty proceedings of exalted personages, and their "migrations from the blue bed to the brown;" and some of your readers are sure to be of my mind.

The Princess's Theatre, Oxford Street, is being reconstructed. The walls, far more substantial than they build now-a-days, are to stand, but the old interior is demolished, and the roof heightened.

Sullivan, a young carpenter, was at work with his fellows on a stage properly secured. They wanted some ropes that lay on another stage, and sent him for them. Between the stages was a plank, which he naturally thought had been laid to walk on. He stepped on it—it was only a half-inch board. It snapped under his weight like a carrot, and he fell through in a moment.

He caught at a projection, but merely tore his fingers, and descended into space with fearful velocity.

The height was fifty feet—measured.

The thing he fell on was a hard board, lying on hard ground. Those who saw him fall, and heard his one cry of horror, had no hope of taking up anything from the ground below but a battered corpse with broken back, fractured skull, and shattered ribs.

Thirty five feet below the place he fell from, a strong bolt, about an inch in diameter and four feet long, protruded from the wall almost at right angles, but with a slight declension downwards.

The outer end of this protruding iron just caught Sullivan by the seat, ripped up his clothes, and tore his back, and partly broke his fall. Nevertheless, such was its violence that he bounded up from the board he eventually fell upon, and was found all of a heap in a hollow place close by, senseless, and almost pulseless.

He was taken to the Middlesex Hospital. There he came to his senses and his trouble. His pulse was soon over 100. His temperature 108—a very alarming feature. This, however, has subsided, and they have got his pulse to 98, but he cannot eat; his eyes cannot bear the light. There are one or more severe wounds upon his back parts, and much reason to fear injury to the spinal column. He is in danger; and, if he survives, which I think very possible, it is to be feared he will never be able to walk and work again. These, sir, are the dire realities of life; and very fit to be admitted into your graver columns. Here is a sad fact and a curious fact.

Sullivan was a handsome young fellow, just beginning the world. In a moment there he lies a cripple and a wreck, and that is a sad thing for any feeling heart to think of. The bolt which saved him from immediate death is a curious fact. It is still to be seen dangling from the wall as it did, when it ripped up the workman's clothes, furrowed his back, and broke his fall.

Will it prove his friend or his enemy, that piece of iron? The enemy of his body if it makes him a cripple instead of a corpse; but the friend of his soul if he reads his own story right: wherefore I hope some servant of God will go to his bedside with the true balm of Gilead.

I am Sir,

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

July, 1880.

PERSEVERANCE.

ON a certain day in the year 1819, Mr. Chitty, an attorney in Shaftesbury, was leaving his office for the day, when he was met at the door by a respectable woman and a chubby-faced boy with a bright eye. He knew the woman slightly—a widow that kept a small stationer's shop in the town.

She opened her business at once.

"Oh, Mr. Chitty, I have brought you my Robert; he gives me no peace; his heart is so set on being in a lawyer's office. But there, I have not got the money to apprentice him. Only we thought perhaps you could find some place or other for him, if it was ever so small." Then she broke off and looked appealingly, and the boy's cheeks and eyes were fired with expectation.

Most country towns at that time possessed two solicitors, who might be called types; the old-established man, whose firm for generations had done the pacific and lucrative business—wills, settlements, partnerships, mortgages, etc.—and the sharp practitioner, who was the abler of the two at litigation, and had to shake the plum tree instead of sitting under it and opening his mouth for the windfalls. Mr. Chitty was No. 2.

But these sharp practitioners are often very good-natured; and so, looking at the pleading widow and the beaming boy, he felt disposed to oblige them, and rather sorry he could not. He said his was a small office, and he had no clerk's place vacant; "and, indeed, if I had, he is too young; why he is a mere child!"

"I am twelve next so-and-so," said the boy, giving the month and the day.

"You don't look it, then," said Mr. Chitty incredulously.

"Indeed, but he is, sir," said the widow; "he never looked his age, and writes a beautiful hand."

"But I tell you I have no vacancy," said Mr. Chitty, turning dogged.

"Well, thank you, sir, all the same," said the widow with the patience of her sex. "Come, Robert, we mustn't detain the gentleman."

So they turned away with disappointment marked on their faces, the boy's especially.

Then Mr. Chitty said in a hesitating way: "To be sure, there is a vacancy, but it is not the sort of thing for you."

"What is it, sir, if you please?" asked the widow.

"Well, we want an office boy."

"An office boy! What do you say, Robert? I suppose it is a beginning, sir. What will he have to do?"

"Why, sweep the office, run errands, carry papers—and that is not what he is after. Look at him—he has got that eye of his fixed on a counsellor's wig, you may depend; and sweeping a country attorney's office is not the stepping-stone to that." He added warily, "at least, there is no precedent reported."

"La! sir," said the widow, "he only wants to turn an honest penny, and be among law-papers."

"Ay, ay, to write 'em and sell 'em, but not to dust 'em!"

"For that matter, sir, I believe he'd rather be the dust itself in your office than bide at home with me." Here she turned angry with her offspring for half a moment.

"And so I would," said young master stoutly, endorsing his mother's hyperbole very boldly, though his own mind was not of that kind which originates metaphors, similes, and engines of inaccuracy in general.

"Then I say no more," observed Mr. Chitty; "only mind, it is half-a-crown a week—that is all."

The terms were accepted, and Master Robert entered on his humble duties. He was steady, persevering, and pushing; in less than two years he got promoted to be a copying clerk. From this in due course he became a superior clerk. He studied, pushed and persevered, till at last he became a fair practical lawyer, and Mr. Chitty's head clerk. And so much for Perseverance.

He remained some years in this position, trusted by his employer and respected too; for besides his special gifts as a law clerk, he was strict in morals, and religious without parade.

In those days country attorneys could not fly to the metropolis and back to dinner. They relied much on London attorneys, their agents. Lawyer Chitty's agent was Mr. Bishop, a judge's clerk; but in those days a judge's clerk had an insufficient stipend, and was allowed to eke it out by private practice. Mr. Bishop was agent to several country attorneys. Well, Chitty had a heavy case coming on at the assizes, and asked Bishop to come down for once in a way and help him in person. Bishop did so, and in working the case was delighted with Chitty's managing clerk. Before leaving, he said he sadly wanted a managing clerk he could rely on. Would Mr. Chitty oblige him and part with this young man?

Chitty made rather a wry face, and said that young man was a pearl. "I don't know what I shall do without him; why, he is my alter ego."

However, he ended by saying generously that he would not stand in the young man's way. Then they had the clerk in and put the question to him.

"Sir," said he, "it is the ambition of my heart to go to London."

Twenty-four hours after that, our humble hero was installed in Mr. Bishop's office, directing a large business in town and country. He filled that situation for many years, and got to be well known in the legal profession. A brother of mine, who for years was one of a firm of solicitors in Lincoln's Inn Fields, remembers him well at this period; and to have met him sometimes in his own chambers and sometimes in Judge's Chambers; my brother says he could not help noticing him, for he bristled with intelligence, and knew a deal of law, though he looked a boy.

The best of the joke is that this clerk afterwards turned out to be four years older than that solicitor who took him for a boy.

He was now amongst books as well as lawyers, and studied closely the principles of law whilst the practice was sharpening him. He was much in the courts, and every case there cited in argument or judgment he hunted out in the books, and digested it, together with its application in practice by the living judge, who had quoted, received, or evaded it. He was a Baptist, and lodged with a Baptist minister and his two daughters. He fell in love with one of them, proposed to her, and was accepted. The couple were married without pomp, and after the ceremony the good minister took them aside, and said, "I have only £200 in the world ; I have saved it a little at a time, for my two daughters. Here is your share my children. Then he gave his daughter £100, and she handed it to the bridegroom on the spot. The good minister smiled approval and they sat down to what fine folk call breakfast, but they called dinner, and it was.

After dinner and the usual ceremonies, the bridegroom rose and surprised them a little. He said, "I am very sorry to leave you, but I have a particular business to attend to ; it will take me just one hour."

Of course there was a look or two interchanged, especially by every female there present ; but the confidence in him was too great to be disturbed ; and this was his first eccentricity.

He left them, went to Gray's Inn, put down his name as a student for the Bar ; paid away his wife's dowry in the fees, and returned within the hour.

Next day the married clerk was at the office as usual, and entered on a twofold life. He worked as a clerk till five, dined in the Hall of Gray's Inn as a sucking barrister ; and studied hard at night. This was followed by a still stronger example of duplicate existence, and one without a parallel in my reading and experience—he became a writer, and produced a master-piece, which, as regarded the practice of our courts, became at once the manual of attorneys, counsel, and judges.

The author, though his book was entitled "practice," showed some qualities of a jurist, and corrected soberly but firmly unscientific legislature and judicial blunders.

So here was a student of Gray's Inn, supposed to be picking up in that Inn a small smattering of law, yet, to diversify his crude studies, instructing mature counsel and correcting the judges themselves, at whose chambers he attended daily, cap in hand, as an attorney's clerk. There's an intellectual hotch-potch for you ! All this did not in his Inn qualify him to be a barrister ; but years and dinners did. After some weary years he took the oaths at Westminster, and vacated by that act his place in Bishop's office, and was a pauper—for an afternoon.

But work, that has been long and tediously prepared, can be executed quickly ; and adverse circumstances, when Perseverance conquers them, turn round and become allies.

The ex-clerk and young barrister had ploughed and sowed with such pains and labour, that he reaped with comparative ease. Half the managing clerks in London knew him and believed in him. They had the ear of their employers, and brought him pleadings to draw and motions to make. His book, too, brought him clients; and he was soon in full career as a junior counsel and special pleader. Senior counsel too found that they could rely upon his zeal, accuracy, and learning. They began to request that he might be retained with them in difficult cases, and he became first junior counsel at the bar; and so much for Perseverance.

Time rolled its ceaseless course, and a silk gown was at his disposal. Now, a popular junior counsel cannot always afford to take silk, as they call it. Indeed, if he is learned, but not eloquent, he may ruin himself by the change. But the remarkable man, whose career I am epitomising, did not hesitate; he still pushed onward, and so one morning the Lord Chancellor sat for an hour in the Queen's Bench, and Mr. Robert Lush was appointed one of Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the Law, and then and there, by the Chancellor's invitation, stepped out from among the juniors and took his seat within the Bar. So much for Perseverance.

From this point the outline of his career is known to everybody. He was appointed in 1865 one of the Judges of the Queen's Bench, and, after sitting in that Court some years, was promoted to be a Lord Justice of Appeal.

A few days ago he died, lamented and revered by the legal profession, which is very critical, and does not bestow its respect lightly.

I knew him only as Queen's Counsel. I had him against me once, but oftener for me, because my brother thought him even then the best lawyer and the most zealous at the Bar, and always retained him if he could. During the period I knew him personally Mr. Lush had still a plump, unwrinkled face, and a singularly bright eye. His voice was full, mellow, and penetrating; it filled the Court without apparent effort, and accorded well with his style of eloquence, which was what Cicero calls the temperatum genus loquendi.

Reasoning carried to perfection is one of the fine arts; an argument by Lush enchained the ear and charmed the understanding. He began at the beginning, and each succeeding topic was articulated and disposed of, and succeeded by its right successor, in language so fit and order so lucid, that he rooted and grew conviction in the mind. Tantum series nequeque pollut.

I never heard him at Nisi Prius, but should think he could do nothing ill, yet would be greater at convincing judges than at persuading juries right or wrong; for at this pastime he would have to escape from the force of his own understanding; whereas I have known counsel blatant and admired, whom Nature and flippant fluency had secured against that difficulty.

He was affable to clients, and I had more than one conversation with him, very interesting to me. But to intrude these would be egotistical, and disturb the just proportions of this short notice. I hope some lawyer, who knew him well as counsel and judge, will give us his distinctive features, if it is only to correct those vague and colourless notices of him that have appeared.

This is due to the legal profession. But, after all, his early career interests a much wider circle. We cannot all be judges: but we can all do great things by the perseverance, which, from an office boy, made this man a clerk, a counsel, and a judge. Do but measure the difficulties he overcame in his business with the difficulties of rising in any art, profession, or honourable walk; and down with despondency's whine, and the groans of self-deceiving laziness. You who have youth and health, never you quail

Low birth and iron fortune.”

See what becomes of those two bugbears when the stout champion SINGLE-HEART and the giant PERSEVERANCE take them by the throat.

Why the very year those chilling lines were first given to the public by Bulwer and Macready, Robert Lush paid his wife's dowry away to Gray's Inn in fees, and never whined nor doubted nor looked right nor left, but went straight on—and prevailed.

Genius and talent may have their bounds—but to the power of single-hearted perseverance there is no known limit.

Non omnis mortuus est; the departed judge still teaches from his tomb; his dicta will outlive him in our English Courts; his gesta are for mankind.

Such an instance of single-heartedness, perseverance and proportionate success in spite of odds is not for one narrow island but the globe; an old man sends it to the young in both hemispheres with this comment: If difficulties lie in the way, never shirk them, but think of Robert Lush, and trample on them. If impossibilities encounter you—up hearts and at 'em.

One thing more to those who would copy Robert Lush in all essentials. Though impregnated from infancy with an honourable ambition, he remembered his Creator in the days of his youth; nor did he forget Him, when the world poured its honours on him, and those insidious temptations of prosperity, which have hurt the soul far oftener than “low birth and iron fortune.” He flourished in a sceptical age; yet he lived, and died, fearing God.

A HERO AND A MARTYR.

THERE is an old man in Glasgow, who has saved more than forty lives in the Clyde, many of them with great peril to his own. Death has lately removed a French hero, who was his rival, and James Lambert now stands alone in Europe. The Frenchman saved more lives than Lambert, but then he did most of his good work with a boat and saving gear. The Scot had nothing but his own active body, his rare power of suspending the breath, and his lion heart. Two of his feats far surpass anything recorded of his French competitor: he was upset in a boat with many companions, seized and dragged to the bottom, yet contrived to save nearly them all; and on another occasion, when the ice had broken under a man, and the tide had sucked him under to a distance of several yards, James Lambert dived under the ice, and groped for the man till he was nearly breathless, and dragged him back to the hole, and all but died in saving him. Here the chances were nine to one against his ever finding that small aperture again, and coming out alive. Superior in daring to his one European rival, he has yet another title to the sympathy of mankind; he is blind: and not by any irrelevant accident, but in consequence of his heroism and his goodness. He was working at a furnace one wintry day, and perspiring freely. The cry got up that a man was drowning. He flung himself, all heated as he was, into icy water, and, when he came out, he lost his sight for a time on the very bank. His sight returned: but ever after that day he was subject to similar seizures. They became more frequent, and the intervals of sight more rare until the darkness settled down, and the light retired for ever.

The meaning of the word "martyr" is—a man who is punished for a great virtue by a great calamity. Every martyr in Foxe's book, or Butler's, or the "Acta Sanctorum," or the "Vitæ Patrum Occidentis," comes under that definition; but not more so than James Lambert; and the hero who risks his life in saving, is just as much a hero as he who risks his life in killing, his fellow-creatures. Therefore I do not force nor pervert words, but weigh them well, when I call James Lambert what he is—a hero and a martyr. That is a great deal to say of any one man; for all of us who are really men or women, and not, as Lambert once said to me “mere broom-besoms in the name o’ men,” admire a hero, and pity a martyr, alive or dead.

In espousing this hero’s cause I do but follow a worthy example. Mr. Hugh M’Donald was a Glasgow citizen, and a man known by many acts of charity and public feeling. He revealed to the Glasgow public the very existence of Burns’ daughter, and awakened a warm interest in her; and in 1856 he gave the city an account of James Lambert’s deeds and affliction, and asked a subscription. Glasgow responded warmly; £260 was raised, and afterwards £70. The sum total was banked, and doled to James Lambert ten shillings per week. However, the subscribers made one great mistake, they took for granted Lambert would not outlive their money: but he has.

In 1868, having read Mr. M’Donald’s account, I visited Lambert, and heard his story. Being now blind, and compelled to live in the past, he had a vivid recollection of his greatest deeds and told me them with spirit. I, who am a painstaking man, and owe my success to it, wrote down the particulars, and the very words that, he said, had passed on these grand occasions. Next day, I took the blind hero down to the Clyde, whose every bend he knew at that time, and made him repeat to me every principal incident on its own spot. From that day I used to send James Lambert money and clothes at odd times; but I did not write about him for years. However, in 1874, I published my narrative (entitled “A Hero and a Martyr”) in the Pall Mall Gazette, London, the Tribune, New York, and a shilling pamphlet with a fine engraving of James Lambert. I invited a subscription, and, avoiding the error of the former subscribers, announced from the first that it should be directed to buying James Lambert a small annuity for life. The printed story flew round the world. Letters and small subscriptions poured in from every part of England, and in due course from Calcutta, from the Australian capitals, from New York, Boston, San Francisco, and even from Valparaiso in Chili. An American boy sent me a dollar from New Orleans. Two American children sent me a dollar from Chicago. A warm-hearted Glasgow man wrote to me with rapture from the State of Massachusetts, to say every word was true; he remembered blythe Jamie well, and his unrivalled reputation; remembered his saving the mill-girls, and added an incident to my narrative, that in all the horror of the scene James Lambert's voice had been heard from the bank shouting lustily, "Dinna grip my arms, lassies: hing on to my skirts." The English papers quoted largely from the narrative and recommended the subscriptions. But, whilst the big world rang with praises of the Glasgow hero, and thrilled with pity for the Glasgow martyr, detractors and foes started up in a single city. And what was the name of that city? Was it Rome jealous for Regulus and Quintus Curtius? Was it Tarsus jealous for St. Paul? Was it Edinburgh, Liverpool, Paris, or Washington? Oh, dear no: marvellous to relate, it was Glasgow, the City of Hugh Macdonald, the hero's own birthplace,—and the town which the world honours for having produced him. These detractors deny James Lambert's exploits, or say they were few and small, not many and great. They treat his blindness and its cause as a mere irrelevant trifle, and pretend he squandered the last subscription—which is a lie, for he never had the control of it, and it lasted ten years. Scribblers who get drunk three times a week, pretend that Lambert—who, by the admission of his enemy McEwen, has not been drunk once these last five years—is an habitual drunkard, and that they, of all people, are shocked at it. Need I say that these detractors from merit and misfortune are anonymous writers in the "Glasgow Press." It does not follow they are all natives of Glasgow. Two of them, at least, are dirty little penny-a-liners from London. The public knows nothing about the Press, and is easily gulled by it. But I know all about the Press, inside and out, and shall reveal the true motive of the little newspaper conspiracy against Lambert and Reade. It is just the jealousy of the little provincial scribbler maddened by the overwhelming superiority of the national writer. I'll put the minds of these quill-drivers into words for you. "Curse it all! there was a hero and a martyr in our midst, and we hadn't the luck to spot him. [In reality they had not brains enough in their skulls nor blood enough in their hearts to spot him. But it is their creed, that superior discernment is all luck.] Then comes this cursed Englishman and hits the theme we missed. What can we pigmies do now to pass for giants? It's no use our telling the truth and playing second fiddle. No—our only chance now, to give ourselves importance, is to hiss down both the hero and his chronicler. If we call Lambert an impostor and a drunkard, and Reade a mercenary fool, honest folk will never divine that we are ourselves the greatest drunkards, the greatest dunces, and the most habitual liars in the city." That was the little game of the Glasgow penny-a-liners, and twopence a-liars; and every man in Scotland, who knows the provincial Press, saw through these caitiffs at a glance. But the public is weak and credulous. Now, they might as well bay the moon as bark at me; I stand too high above their reach in the just respect of the civilized world. But they can hurt James Lambert, because he is their townsman. Therefore, I interfere and give the citizens of Glasgow the key to the Glasgow backbiters of a Glasgow hero and martyr. I add one proof that this is the true key. The exploits and the calamity of James Lambert were related by Hugh Macdonald eighteen years ago when proofs were plentiful. If they were true eighteen years ago how can they be false now? Answer me that, honest men of Glasgow, who don't scribble in papers and call black white. Can facts be true when told by a Glasgow man, yet turn false when told by an Englishman? ? ? !!! Now observe—they might have shown their clannishness as nobly as they have shown it basely. There are brave men in England—many; and unfortunate men—many; whom a powerful English writer could celebrate. But no—he selects a Scotchman for his theme, and makes the great globe admire him, and moves England to pity him and provide for him. Any Scotch writer worthy of the name of Scotchman, or man, observing this, would have said—"Well, this English chap is not narrow-minded any way. You need not be a Cockney to win his heart and gain his pen. He is warmer about this Glasgow man, than we ever knew him to be about a south country-man. It is a good example. Let us try and rise to his level, and shake hands with the Southron over poor Jamie Lambert." This is how every Scotsman, worthy of the name, would have felt and argued. But these Glasgow scribblers are few of them Scotsmen, and none of them men. The line they have taken in vilifying a blind man, who lost his sight by benevolent heroism, is one that hell chuckles at, and man recoils from. They have disgraced the city of Glasgow and human nature itself. Whatever may be the faults of the working classes, they are MEN. Anonymous slanderers and detractors are not men—they are mere lumps of human filth. I therefore ask the operatives of Glasgow; and the manly citizens, to shake off these lumps of dirt and detraction, and aid me to take the Glasgow hero and martyr out of all his troubles.

The Frenchman I have mentioned had one great title to sympathy, whereas Lambert has two; and this is how France treated her heroic son.—He lived at the public expense, but free as air. The public benefactor was not locked up and hidden from the public. His breast was emblazoned with medals, and amongst them shone the great national order, the Cross of the Legion of Honour, which many distinguished noblemen and gentlemen have sighed for in vain; and when he walked abroad every gentleman in the country doffed his hat to him. Thus does France treat a great saver of human lives. James Lambert lives at the public expense, but not as that Frenchman lived. It grieves my heart to say it; but the truth is, James Lambert lives unhappily. He is in an almshouse, which partakes of the character of a prison. It is a gloomy, austere place, and that class of inmates, to which he belongs, are not allowed to cross the threshold upon their own business, except once in a fortnight. But to ardent spirits loss of liberty is misery. Meanly clad, poorly fed, well imprisoned, and little respected—such is the condition of James Lambert in Glasgow, his native city. Yet he is the greatest man in that city, and one of the very few men now living in it, whose name will ring in history a hundred years hence; the greatest saver of lives in Europe; a man whose name is even now honoured in India and Australia, in the United States and Canada, and indeed from the rising to the setting sun, thanks to his own merit, the power of the pen, and the circulation of the Press—a true hero and a true martyr, glorious by his deeds and sacred by his calamity.

A DRAMATIC MUSICIAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "KRA."

SIR,—There died the other day in London a musician, who used to compose, or set, good music to orchestral instruments, and play it in the Theatre with spirit and taste, and to watch the stage with one eye and the orchestra with another, and so accompany with vigilant delicacy a mixed scene of action and dialogue ; to do which the music must be full when the actor works in silence, but subdued promptly as as often as the actor speaks. Thus it enhances the action without drowning a spoken line.

These are varied gifts, none of them common, and music is a popular art. One would think, then, that such a composer and artist would make his fortune nowadays. Not so. Mr Edwin Ellis lived sober, laborious, prudent, respected, and died poor. He was provident and insured his life ; he had a family and so small an income that he could not keep up the insurance. He has left a wife and nine children utterly destitute, and he could not possibly help it. The kindest-hearted Profession in the world—though burdened with many charitable claims—will do what it can for them ; but I do think the whole weight ought not to fall upon actors and musicians. The man was a better servant of the public than people are aware, and therefore I ask leave to say a few words to the public and to the Press over his ill-remunerated art, and his untimely grave.

Surely the prizes of the Theatre are dealt too unevenly, when such a man for his compositions and his performance receives not half the salary of many a third class performer on the stage, works his heart out, never wastes a shilling, and dies without one.

No individual is to blame ; but the system seems indiscriminating and unjust, and arises from a special kind of ignorance, which is very general, but I think and hope is curable.

Dramatic effects are singularly complex, and they cannot really be understood unless they are decomposed. But it is rare to find, out of the Theatre, a mind accustomed to decompose them. The writer is constantly blamed for the actor's misinterpretation, and the actor for the writer's feebleness. Indeed, the general inability to decompose and so discriminate goes so far as this—You hear an author gravely accused by a dozen commentators of writing a new play four hours long. Of those four hours the stage-carpenter occupied one hour and thirty minutes. Yet they ascribe that mechanic's delay to the lines and delivery, when all the time it was the carpenter, who had not rehearsed his part, and therefore kept the author and the actors waiting just as long as he did the audience.

Where the habit of decomposing effects is so entirely absent, it follows, as a matter of course, that the subtle subsidiary art of the able leader is not distinguished, and goes for nothing in the public estimate of a play. I suppose two million people have seen Shann the Post escape from his prison by mounting the ivied tower, and have panted at the view. Of those two million how many are aware that they saw with the ear as well as the eye, and that much of their emotion was caused by a mighty melody, such as effeminate Italy never produced—and never will till she breeds more men and less monks—being played all the time on the great principle of climax, swelling higher and higher, as the hero of the scene mounted and surmounted? Not six in the two million spectators, I believe. Mr. Ellis has lifted scenes and situations for me and other writers scores of times, and his share of the effect never been publicly noticed. When he had a powerful action or impassioned dialogue to illustrate he did not habitually run to the poor resource of a "hurry" or a nonsense "tremolo," but loved to find an appropriate melody, or a rational sequence of chords, or a motived strain, that raised the scene or enforced the dialogue. As to his other qualities, it was said of Cæsar that he was a general who used not to say to his soldiers "go" but "come," and that is how Mr. Ellis led an orchestra. He showed them how to play with spirit by doing it himself. He was none of your sham leaders with a bâton, but a real leader with a violin, that set his band on fire. A little while before he died he tried change of air, by the kind permission of Messrs. Gatti, and he helped me down at Liverpool. He entered a small orchestra of good musicians that had become languid. He waked them up directly, and they played such fine music and so finely that the entr'acte music became at once a feature of the entertainment. A large theatre used to ring nightly with the performance of fifteen musicians only; and the Lancashire lads, who know what is good, used to applaud so loudly and persistently that Mr. Ellis had to rise nightly in the orchestra and bow to them before the curtain could be raised.

Then I repeat that there must be something wrong in the scale of remuneration, when such a man works for many years and dies in need, without improvidence. In all other professions there are low rewards and high rewards. On what false principles does such a man as Ellis receive the same pittance as a mediocre leader, who doses a play with tremolo, and "hurries," and plays you dead with polkas between the acts, and, though playing to a British audience, rarely plays a British melody but to destroy it by wrong time, wrong rhythm, coarse and slovenly misinterpretation, ploughing immortal airs, not playing them?

I respectfully invite the Press over this sad grave, to look into these matters—to adopt the habit of decomposing all the complex effects of a theatre; to ignore nobody, neither artist nor mechanic, who affects the public; to time the carpenters' delays on a first night and report them to a second; to time the author's lines and report their time to a minute; to criticise as an essential part of the performance the music, appropriate or inappropriate, intelligent or brainless, that accompanies the lines and action; and not even to ignore the quality and execution of the entr'acte music. A thousand people have to listen to it three quarters of an hour, and those thousand people ought not to be swindled out of a part of their money by the misinterpretation of Italian overtures or by the everlasting performance of polkas and waltzes. These last are good musical accompaniments to the foot, but to seated victims they are not music, but mere rhythmical thumps. There is no excuse for this eternal trash, since the stores of good music are infinite.

If the Press will deign to take a hint from me, and so set themselves to decompose and discriminate, plays will soon be played quicker on a first night, and accomplished artists like Edwin Ellis will not work hard, live soberly, and die poor. Meantime, I do not hesitate to ask the public to repair in some degree the injustice of fortune. Millions of people have passed happy evenings at the Adelphi Theatre. Thousands have heard Mr. Ellis accompany The Wandering Heir and between the acts play his "Songs without Music" at the Queen's. I ask them to believe me that this deserving and unfortunate musician caused much of their enjoyment though they were not conscious of it at the time. Those spectators, and all who favour me with their confidence in matters of charity, I respectfully invite to aid the Theatrical and Musical Professions in the effort they are now making to save from dire destitution the widow and children of that accomplished artist and worthy man.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

CHARLES READ.

DEATH OF WINWOOD READE.

FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH," April 26, 1876.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. Winwood Reade, well-known as an African traveller and correspondent, and by many works of indubitable power. This remarkable man closed, on Saturday last, April 24, a laborious career, cheered with few of Fortune's smiles. As a youth he had shown a singular taste for natural science. This, however, was interrupted for some years by University studies, and afterwards by an honest but unavailing attempt to master the art of Fiction, before possessing sufficient experience of life. He produced, however, two or three novels containing some good and racy scenes, unskilfully connected, and one ("See-Saw,") which is a well-constructed tale. He also published an archæological volume, entitled "The Vale of Isis." The theories of M. Du Chaillu as to the power and aggressive character of the gorilla inflamed Mr. Reade's curiosity and awakened his dormant genius. He raised money upon his inheritance, and set out for Africa fully equipped. He hunted the gorilla persistently, and found him an exceedingly timorous animal, inaccessible to European sportsmen in the thick jungles which he inhabits. Mr Reade then pushed his researches another way. On his return he published "Savage Africa," a remarkable book, both in matter and style.

After some years, devoted to general science and anonymous literature, he revisited that Continent—"whose fatal fascinations," as he himself wrote, "no one having seen and suffered, can resist," and this time penetrated deep into the interior. In this expedition he faced many dangers quite alone, was often stricken down with fever, and sometimes in danger of his life from violence, and once was taken prisoner by cannibals. His quiet fortitude and indomitable will carried a naturally feeble body through it all, and he came home weak, but apparently uninjured in constitution. He now published two volumes in quick succession—"The Martyrdom of Man," and the "African Sketchbook"—both of which have met with warm admiration and severe censure. Mr. Reade was now, nevertheless, generally recognised by men of science, and particularly by Dr. Darwin and his school. In November, 1873, he became the Times' Correspondent in the Ashantee war, and, as usual, did not spare himself. From this, his third African expedition, he returned a broken man. The mind had been too strong for the body, and he was obliged to halt on the way home. Early in this present year, disease, both of the heart and lungs, declared itself, and he wasted away slowly but inevitably. He wrote his last work, "The Outcast," with the hand of death upon him. Two zealous friends carried him out to Wimbledon, and there, for a day or two, the air seemed to revive him; but on Friday night he began to sink, and on Saturday afternoon died, in the arms of his beloved uncle, Mr. Charles Reade.

The writer thus cut off in his prime entered life with excellent prospects; he was heir to considerable estates, and gifted with genius. But he did not live long enough to inherit the one or to mature the other. His whole public career embraced but fifteen years; yet in another fifteen he would probably have won a great name, and cured himself, as many thinking men have done, of certain obnoxious opinions, which laid him open to reasonable censure, and also to some bitter personalities that were out of place, since truth can surely prevail without either burning or abusing men whose convictions are erroneous but honest. He felt these acrimonious comments, but bore them with the same quiet fortitude by help of which he had endured his sufferings in Africa, and now awaited the sure approach of an untimely death at home. Mr. Reade surpasses most of the travellers of his day in one great quality of a writer—style. His English, founded on historical models, has the pomp and march of words, is often racy, often picturesque, and habitually powerful yet sober; ample yet not turgid. He died in his 37th year.

FROM THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE."

FIRST LETTER.

August 19th, 1872.

UNDER this heading, for want of a better, let me sing the four-stringed instruments, that were made in Italy from about 1560 to 1760, and varnished with high-coloured yet transparent varnishes, the secret of which, known to numberless families in 1745, had vanished off the earth by 1760, and has now for fifty years baffled the laborious researches of violin makers, amateurs, and chemists. That lost art I will endeavour to restore to the world through the medium of your paper. But let me begin with other points of connoisseurship, illustrating them as far as possible by the specimens on show at the South Kensington Museum.

The modern orchestra uses four-stringed instruments, played with the bow; the smallest is the king; its construction is a marvel of art; and, as we are too apt to underrate familiar miracles, let me analyze this wooden paragon, by way of showing what great architects in wood those Italians were, who invented this instrument and its fellows at Brescia and Bologna. The violin itself, apart from its mere accessories, consists of a scroll or head, weighing an ounce or two, a slim neck, a thin back, that ought to be made of Swiss sycamore, a thin belly of Swiss deal, and sides of Swiss sycamore no thicker than a sixpence. This little wooden shell delivers an amount of sound that is simply monstrous; but, to do that, it must submit to a strain, of which the public has no conception. Let us suppose two Claimants to take opposite ends of a violin-string, and to pull against each other with all their weight; the tension of the string so produced would not equal the tension which is created by the screw in raising that string to concert pitch. Consider, then, that not one but four strings tug night and day, like a team of demons, at the wafer-like sides of this wooden shell. Why does it not collapse; Well, it would collapse with a crash, long before the strings reached concert pitch, if the violin was not a wonder inside as well as out. The problem was to withstand that severe pressure without crippling the vast vibration by solidity. The inventors approached the difficulty thus: they inserted six blocks of lime, or some light wood; one of these blocks at the lower end of the violin, one at the upper, and one at each corner—the corner blocks very small and triangular; the top and bottom blocks much larger, and shaped like a capital D, the straight line of the block lying close to the sides, and the curved line outwards. Then they slightly connected all the blocks by two sets of linings; these linings are not above a quarter of an inch deep, I suppose, and no thicker than an old penny piece, but they connect those six blocks and help to distribute the resistance.

Even so the shell would succumb in time; but now the inventor killed two birds with one stone; he cunningly diverted a portion of the pressure by the very means that were necessary to the sound. He placed the bridge on the belly of the violin, and that raised the strings out of the direct line of tension, and relieved the lateral pressure at the expense of the belly. But as the belly is a weak arch, it must now be strengthened in its turn. Accordingly, a bass-bar was glued horizontally to the belly under one foot of the bridge. This bass-bar is a very small piece of deal, about the length and half the size of an old-fashioned lead pencil, but, the ends being tapered off, it is glued on to the belly, with a spring in it, and supports the belly magically. As a proof how nicely all these things were balanced, the bass-bar of Gasparo da Salo, the Amati, and Stradiuarius, being a little shorter and shallower than a modern bass-bar, did admirably for their day, yet will not do now. Our raised concert pitch has clapped on more tension, and straightway you must remove the bass-bar even of Stradiuarius, and substitute one a little longer and deeper, or your Cremona sounds like a strung frying-pan.

Remove now from the violin, which for two centuries has endured this strain, the finger-board, tail-piece, tail-pin and screws—since these are the instruments or vehicles of tension, not materials of resistance—and weigh the violin itself. It weighs, I suppose, about twenty ounces: and it has fought hundredweights of pressure for centuries. A marvel of construction, it is also a marvel of sound; it is audible farther off than the gigantic pianoforte, and its tones in a master's hand go to the heart of man. It can be prostituted to the performance of difficulties, and often is; but that is not its fault. Genius can make your very heart dance with it, or your eyes to fill; and Niel Gow, who was no romancer, but only a deeper critic than his fellows, when being asked what was the true test of a player, replied, “A MON IS A PLAYER WHEN HE CAN GAR HIMSEL’ GREET WI’ HIS FIDDLE.”

Asking forgiveness for this preamble, I proceed to enquire what country invented these four-stringed and four-cornered instruments?

I understand that France and Germany have of late raised some pretensions. Connoisseurship and etymology are both against them. Etymology suffices. The French terms are all derived from the Italian, and that disposes of France. I will go into German pretensions critically, if any one will show me as old and specific a German word as viola and violino, and the music composed for those German instruments. “Fiddle” is of vast antiquity; but pear-shaped, till Italy invented the four corners, on which sound as well as beauty depends.

THE ORDER OF INVENTION.—Etymology decides with unerring voice that the violoncello was invented after the violono or double-bass, and connoisseurship proves by two distinct methods that it was invented after the violin. 1st the critical method: it is called after the violon, yet is made on the plan of the violin, with arched back and long inner bought. 2nd, the historical method: a violoncello made by the inventors of the violin is incomparably rare, and this instrument is disproportionately rare even up to the year 1610. Violino being a derivative of viola would seem to indicate that the violin followed the tenor; but this taken alone is dangerous; for viola is not only a specific term for the tenor, but a generic name that was in Italy a hundred years before a tenor with four strings was made. To go then to connoisseurship—I find that I have fallen in with as many tenors as violins by Gasparo da Salo, who worked from about 1555 to 1600, and not quite so many by Gio Paolo Maggini, who began a few years later. The violin being the king of all these instruments, I think there would not be so many tenors made as violins, when once the violin had been invented. Moreover, between the above dates came Corelli, a composer and violinist. He would naturally create a crop of violins. Finding the tenors and violins of Gasparo da Salo about equal in number, I am driven to the conclusion that the tenor had an unfair start—in other words, was invented first. I add to this that true four-stringed tenors by Gasparo da Salo exist, though very rare, made with only two corners, which is a more primitive form than any violin by the same maker appears in. For this and some other reasons, I have little doubt the viola preceded the violin by a very few years. What puzzles me more is to time the violon, or, as we childishly call it (after its known descendant), the double-bass. If I was so presumptuous as to trust to my eye alone, I should say it was the first of them all. It is an instrument which does not seem to mix with these four-stringed upstarts, but to belong to a much older family—viz. the viola d'amore, da gamba, &c. In the first place it has not four strings; secondly, it has not an arched back, but a flat back, with a peculiar shoulder, copied from the viola da gamba; thirdly, the space between the upper and lower corners in the early specimens is ludicrously short. And it is hard to believe that an eye, which had observed the graceful proportions of the tenor and violin, could be guilty of such a wretched little inner-bought as you find in a double-bass of Brescia. Per contra, it must be admitted, first, that the sound-hole of a Brescian double-bass seems copied from the four-stringed tribe, and not at all from the elder family; secondly, that the violin and tenor are instruments of melody or harmony, but the violon of harmony only. This is dead against its being invented until after the instruments to which it is subsidiary. Man invents only to supply a want. Thus, then, it is. First, the large tenor, played between the knees; then the violin, played under the chin; then (if not the first of them all) the small double-bass: then, years after the violin, the violoncello; then the full-sized double-bass; then, longo intervallo, the small tenor, played under the chin.

However, I do not advance these conclusions as infallible. The highest evidence on some of these points must surely lie in manuscript music of the sixteenth century, much of which is preserved in the libraries of Italy; and, if Mr. Hatton or any musician learned in the history of his art will tell me for what stringed instruments the immediate predecessors of Corelli, and Corelli at his commencement, marked their compositions, I shall receive the communication with gratitude and respect. I need hardly say that nothing but the MS. or the editio princeps is evidence in so nice a matter.

The first known maker of the true tenor, and probably of the violin, was Gasparo da Salo. The student who has read the valuable work put forth by Monsieur Fétis and Monsieur Vuillaume might imagine that I am contradicting them here; for they quote as "luthiers"—antecedent to Gasparo da Salo—Kerlino, Duiffoprugcar, Linarolli, Dardelli, and others. These men, I grant you, worked long before Gasparo da Salo; I even offer an independent proof, and a very simple one. I find that their genuine tickets are in Gothic letters, whereas those of Gasparo da Salo are in Roman type; but I know the works of those makers, and they did not make tenors nor violins. They made instruments of the older family, viole d'amore, da gamba, &c. Their true tickets are all black-letter tickets, and not one such ticket exists in any old violin, nor in a single genuine tenor. The fact is that the tenor is an instrument of unfixed dimensions, and can easily be reconstructed out of different viole made in an earlier age. There are innumerable examples of this, and happily the Exhibition furnishes two. There are two curious instruments strung as tenors, Nos. 114 and 134 in the catalogue: one is given to Joan Carlino, and the year 1452; the other to Linaro, and 1563. These two instruments were both made by one man, Ventura Linarolli, of Venice (misspelt by M. Fétis, Venturi), about the year 1520. Look at the enormous breadth between the sound holes; that shows they were made to carry six or seven strings. Now look at the scrolls; both of them new, because the old scrolls were primitive things with six or seven screws; it is only by such reconstruction that a tenor or violin can be set up as anterior to Gasparo da Salo. No. 114 is, however, a real gem of antiquity; the wood and varnish exquisite, and far fresher than nine Amatis out of ten. It is well worthy the special attention of collectors. It was played upon the knee.

There are in the collection two instruments by Gasparo da Salo worth especial notice; a tenor, No. 142, and a violono, or primitive double-bass, 199. The tenor is one of his later make, yet has a grand primitive character. Observe, in particular, the scroll all round, and the amazing inequality between the bass sound-hole and the purfling of the belly;

this instrument and the grand tenor assigned to Maggini, and lent by Madame Risler, offer a point of connoisseurship worthy the student's attention. The back of each instrument looks full a century younger than the belly. But this is illusory. The simple fact is that the tenors of that day, when not in use, were not nursed in cases, but hung up on a nail, belly outwards. Thus the belly caught the sun of Italy, the dust, &c., and its varnish was often withered to a mere resin, while the back and sides escaped. This is the key to that little mystery. Observe the scroll of the violono 199! How primitive it is all round: at the back a flat cut, in front a single flute, copied from its true parent, the viola da gamba. This scroll, taken in conjunction with the size and other points, marks an instrument considerably anterior to No. 200. As to the other double-basses in the same case, they are assigned by their owners to Gasparo da Salo, because they are double purfled and look older than Cremonese violins; but these indicia are valueless; all Cremona and Milan double-purfled the violon as often as not; and the constant exposure to air and dust gives the violono a colour of antiquity that is delusive. In no one part of the business is knowledge of work so necessary. The violoni 201-2-3, are all fine Italian instruments. The small violon, 202, that stands by the side of the Gasparo da Salo, 199, has the purfling of Andreas Amatus, the early sound-hole of Andreas Amatus; the exquisite corners and finish of Andreas Amatus; the finely cut scroll of Andreas Amatus; at the back of scroll the neat shell and square shoulder of Andreas Amatus; and the back, instead of being made of any rubbish that came to hand, after the manner of Brescia, is of true fiddle wood, cut the bastard way of the grain, which was the taste of the Amati; and, finally, it is varnished with the best varnish of the Amati. Under these circumstances, I hope I shall not offend the owner by refusing it the inferior name of Gasparo da Salo. It is one of the brightest gems of the collection, and not easily to be matched in Europe.

SECOND LETTER.

August 24th, 1872.

GIO PAOLO MAGGINI is represented at the Kensington Museum by an excellent violin, No. 111, very fine in workmanship and varnish, but as to the model a trifle too much hollowed at the sides, and so a little inferior to some of his violins, and to the violin No. 70, the model of which, like many of the Brescian school, is simple and perfect. (Model as applied to a violin, is a term quite distinct from outline.) In No. 70 both belly and back are modelled with the simplicity of genius, by even gradation, from the centre, which is the highest part, down to all the borders of the instrument. The world has come back to this primitive model after trying a score, and prejudice gives the whole credit to Joseph Guarnerius, of Cremona. As to the date of No. 70, the neatness and, above all, the slimness of the sound-hole, mark, I think, a period slightly posterior to Gasparo da Salo. This slim sound-hole is an advance, not a retrogression. The gaping sound-holes of Gasparo da Salo and Maggini were their one great error. They were not only ugly; they lessened the ring by allowing the vibration to escape from the cavity too quickly. No. 60, assigned to Duiffoprugcar and a fabulous antiquity, was made by some 'prentice hand in the seventeenth century; but No. 70 would adorn any collection, being an old masterpiece of Brescia or Bologna.

THE SCHOOL OF CREMONA.—Andreas Amatus was more than thirty years old, and an accomplished maker of the older viole, when the violin was invented in Brescia or Bologna. He does not appear to have troubled his head with the new instrument for some years; one proof more that new they were. They would not at first materially influence his established trade; the old and new family ran side by side. Indeed it took the violin tribe two centuries to drive out the viola da gamba. However, in due course, Andreas Amatus set to work on violins. He learned from the Brescian school the only things they could teach a workman so superior—viz., the four corners and the sound-hole. This Brescian sound-hole stuck to him all his days; but what he had learned in his original art remained by him too. The collection contains three specimens of his handiwork: Violin 202, Mrs. Jay's violin—with the modern head—erroneously assigned to Antonius and Hieronymus; and violoncello No. 183. There are also traces of his hand in the fine tenor 139. In the three instruments just named the purfling is composed in just proportions, so that the white comes out with vigour; it is then inlaid with great neatness. The violoncello is the gem. Its outline is grace itself: the four exquisite curves coincide in one pure and serpentine design. This bass is a violin soufflé; were it shown at a distance it would take the appearance of a most elegant violin; the best basses of Stradiarius alone will stand this test. (Apply it to the Venetian masterpiece in the same case.) The scroll is perfect in design and chiselled as by a sculptor; the purfling is quite as fine as Stradiarius; it is violin purfling, yet this seems to add elegance without meanness. It is a masterpiece of Cremona, all but the hideous sound-hole, that alone connects this master with the Brescian school.

His sons Antonius and Hieronymus soon cured themselves of that grotesque sound-hole, and created a great school. They chose better wood and made richer varnish, and did many beautiful things. Nevertheless, they infected Italian fiddle-making with a fatal error. They were the first SCOOPERS. Having improved on Brescia in outline and details, they assumed too hastily that they could improve on her model. So they scooped out the wood about the sound-holes and all round, weakening the connection of the centre with the sides of the belly, and checking the fulness of the vibration. The German school carried this vice much further, but the Amati went too far, and inoculated a hundred fine makers with a wrong idea. It took Stradiarius himself fifty-six years to get entirely clear of it.

The brothers Amati are represented in this collection, first by several tenors that once were noble things, but have been cut on the old system, which was downright wicked. It is cutting in the statutory sense, viz., cutting and maiming. These ruthless men just sawed a crescent off the top, and another off the bottom, and the result is a thing with the inner bought of a giant and the upper and lower bought of a dwarf. If one of these noble instruments survives in England uncut, I implore the owner to spare it; to play on a £5 tenor, with the Amati set before him to look at while he plays. Luckily the scrolls remain to us; and let me draw attention to the scroll of 136. Look at the back of this scroll, and see how it is chiselled—the centre line in relief, how sharp, distinct, and fine; this line is obtained by chiselling out the wood on both sides with a single tool, which fiddle-makers call a gauge, and there is nothing but the eye to guide the hand.

There are two excellent violins of this make in the collection—Mrs. Jay's, and the violin of Mr. C. J. Read, No. 75. This latter is the large pattern of those makers, and is more elegant than what is technically called the grand Amati, but not so striking. To appreciate the merit and the defect of this instrument, compare it candidly with the noble Stradivarius Amatisé that hangs by its side, numbered 82. Take a back view first. In outline they are much alike. In the details of work the Amati is rather superior; the border of the Stradivarius is more exquisite; but the Amati scroll is better pointed and gauged more cleanly, the purfling better composed for effect, and the way that purfling is let in, especially at the corners, is incomparable. On the front view you find the Amati violin is scooped out here and there, a defect the Stradivarius has avoided. I prefer the Stradivarius sound-hole per se; but, if you look at the curves of these two violins, you will observe that the Amati sound-holes are in strict harmony with the curves; and the whole thing the product of one original mind that saw its way.

Nicholas Amatus, the son of Hieronymus, owes his distinct reputation to a single form called by connoisseurs the Grand Amati. This is a very large violin, with extravagantly long corners, extremely fine in all the details. I do not think it was much admired at the time. At all events, he made but few, and his copyists, with the exception of Francesco Rugger, rarely selected that form to imitate. But now-a-days these violins are almost worshipped, and, as the collection is incomplete without one, I hope some gentleman will kindly send one in before it closes. There is also wanting an Amati bass, and, if the purchaser of Mr. Gillott's should feel disposed to supply that gap, it would be a very kind act. The Rugger family is numerous; it is represented by one violin (147).

Leaving the makers of the Guarnerius family—five in number—till the last, we come to Antonius Stradivarius. This unrivalled workman and extraordinary man was born in 1644, and died in December, 1737. There is nothing signed with his name before 1667. He was learning his business thoroughly. From that date till 1736 he worked incessantly, often varying his style, and always improving, till he came to his climax, represented in this collection by the violins 83 and 87, and the violoncello 188.

He began with rather a small, short-cornered violin, which is an imitation of the small Amati, but very superior. He went on, and imitated the large Amati, but softened down the corners. For thirty years—from 1672 to 1703—he poured forth violins of this pattern; there are several in this collection, and one tenor, 139, with a plain back but a beautiful belly, and in admirable preservation. But, while he was making these Amatisé violins by the hundred, he had nevertheless his fits of originality, and put forth an anomaly every now and then; sometimes it was a very long, narrow violin with elegant drooping corners, and sometimes, in a happier mood, he combined these drooping corners with a far more beautiful model. Of these varieties No. 86 gives just an indication; no more. These lucid intervals never lasted long, he was back to his Amatis next week. Yet they left, I think, the germs that broke out so marvellously in the next century. About the year 1703 it seems to have struck him like a revelation that he was a greater man than his master. He dropped him once and for ever, and for nearly twenty years poured forth with unceasing fertility some admirable works, of which you have three fine examples, under average wear, hard wear, and no wear—90, 92, 91. Please look at the three violins in this order to realize what I have indicated before—that time is no sure measure of events in this business. Nevertheless, in all these exquisite productions there was one thing which he thought capable of improvement—there was a slight residue of the scoop, especially at the lower part of the back. He began to alter that about 1720, and by degrees went to his grand model, in which there is no scoop at all. This, his grandest epoch, is represented by the Duke of Cambridge's violin, Mr. Arkwright's, and M. le Comte's: this last has the additional characteristic of the stiffer sound-hole and the wood left broad in the wing of the sound-hole. One feature more of this his greatest epoch: the purfling, instead of exactly following the corner, is pointed across it in a manner completely original. He made these grand violins and a bass or two till about 1729; after that the grand model is confined to his violins, and the details become inferior in finish. Of this there is an example in No. 84, a noble but rough violin, in parts of which certain connoisseurs would see, or fancy they saw, the hand of Bergonzi, or of Francesco or Homobuono Stradivarius. These workmen undoubtedly lived, and survived their father a few years. They seem to have worked up his refuse wood after his death; but their interference with his work while alive has been exaggerated by French connoisseurs. To put a difficult question briefly: their theory fails to observe the style Stradivarius was coming to even in 1727; it also ignores the age of Stradivarius during this his last epoch of work, and says that there exists no old man's work by Stradivarius himself; all this old man's work is done by younger men. However, generalities are useless on a subject so difficult and disputed. The only way is to get the doubtful violins or basses and analyze them, and should the Museum give a permanent corner to Cremonese instruments, this Francesco and Homobuono question will be sifted with examples. The minutiae of work in Stradivarius are numerous and admirable, but they would occupy too much space and are too well known to need discourse. His varnish I shall treat along with the others. A few words about the man. He was a tall, thin veteran, always to be seen with a white leathern apron and a nightcap on his head; in winter it was white wool, and in summer white cotton. His indomitable industry had amassed some fortune, and "rich as Stradivarius" was a byword at Cremona, but probably more current among the fiddle-makers than the bankers and merchants. His price towards the latter part of his career was four louis d'or for a violin; his best customers Italy and Spain. Mr. Forster assures us on unimpeachable authority that he once sent some instruments into England on sale or return, and that they were taken back, the merchant being unable to get £5 for a violoncello. What ho! Hang all the Englishmen of that day who are alive to meet their deserts! However, the true point of the incident is, I think, missed by the narrators. The fact is that then, as now, England wanted old Cremonas, not new ones. That the Amati had a familiar reputation here and probably a ready market can be proved rather prettily out of the mouth of Dean Swift. A violin was left on a chair. A lady swept by. Her mantua caught it and knocked it down and broke it. Then the witty Dean applied a line in Virgil's Eclogue—

"Mantua vae miseræ nimium vicina Cremonæ."

This was certainly said during the lifetime of Stradivarius, and proves that the Cremona fiddle had a fixed reputation; it also proves that an Irishman could make a better Latin pun than any old Roman has left behind him. Since I have diverged into what some brute calls anec-dotage let me conclude this article with one that is at all events to the point, since it tells the eventful history of an instrument now on show.

THE ROMANCE OF FIDDLE-DEALING.—Nearly fifty years ago a gaunt Italian called Luigi Tarisio arrived in Paris one day with a lot of old Italian instruments by makers whose names were hardly known. The principal dealers, whose minds were narrowed, as is often the case, to three or four makers, would not deal with him. M. Georges Chanot, younger and more intelligent, purchased largely, and encouraged him to return. He came back next year with a better lot; and yearly increasing his funds, he flew at the highest game; and in the course of thirty years imported nearly all the finest specimens of Stradivarius and Guarnerius France possesses. He was the greatest connoisseur that ever lived or ever can live, because he had the true mind of a connoisseur and vast opportunities. He ransacked Italy before the tickets in the violins of Francesco Stradivarius, Alexander Gagliano, Lorenzo Guadagnini, Giofredus Cappa, Gobetti, Morgilato Morella, Antonio Mariani, Santo Maggini, and Matteo Benti of Brescia, Michel Angelo Bergonzi, Montagnana, Thomas Balestrieri, Storioni, Vincenzo Rugger, the Testori, Petrus Guarnerius of Venice, and full fifty more, had been tampered with, that every brilliant masterpiece might be assigned to some popular name. To his immortal credit, he fought against this mania, and his motto was "A tout seigneur tout honneur." The man's whole soul was in fiddles. He was a great dealer, but a greater amateur. He had gems by him no money would buy from him. No. 91 was one of them. But for his death you would never have cast eyes on it. He has often talked to me of it; but he would never let me see it, for fear I should tempt him.

Well, one day Georges Chanot, Senior, who is perhaps the best judge of violins left, now Tarisio is gone, made an excursion to Spain, to see if he could find anything there. He found mighty little. But, coming to the shop of a fiddle-maker, one Ortega, he saw the belly of an old bass hung up with other things. Chanot rubbed his eyes, and asked himself, was he dreaming? the belly of a Stradivarius bass roasts.

ing in a shop-window! He went in, and very soon bought it for about forty francs. He then ascertained that the bass belonged to a lady of rank. The belly was full of cracks; so, not to make two bites of a cherry, Ortega had made a nice new one. Chanot carried this precious fragment home and hung it up in his shop, but not in the window, for he is too good a judge not to know the sun will take all the colour out of that maker's varnish. Tarisio came in from Italy, and his eye lighted instantly on the Stradiuarius belly. He pestered Chanot till the latter sold it him for a thousand francs and told him where the rest was. Tarisio no sooner knew this than he flew to Madrid. He learned from Ortega where the lady lived, and called on her to see it. "Sir," says the lady, "it is at your disposition." That does not mean much in Spain. When he offered to buy it, she coquetted with him, said it had been long in her family; money could not replace a thing of that kind, and in short, she put on the screw, as she thought, and sold it him for about four thousand francs. What he did with the Ortega belly is not known—perhaps sold it to some person in the tooth-pick trade. He sailed exultant for Paris with the Spanish bass in a case. He never let it out of his sight. The pair were caught by a storm in the Bay of Biscay. The ship rolled; Tarisio clasped his bass tight, and trembled. It was a terrible gale, and for one whole day they were in real danger. Tarisio spoke of it to me with a shudder. I will give you his real words, for they struck me at the time, and I have often thought of them since—

"AH, MY POOR MR. READE, THE BASS OF SPAIN WAS ALL BUT LOST."

Was not this a true connoisseur? a genuine enthusiast? Observe! there was also an ephemeral insect called Luigi Tarisio, who would have gone down with the bass: but that made no impression on his mind. De minimis non curat Ludovicus.

He got it safe to Paris. A certain high priest in these mysteries, called Vuillaume, with the help of a sacred vessel, called the glue-pot, soon re-wedded the back and sides to the belly, and the bass being now just what it was when the ruffian Ortega put his finger in the pie, was sold for 20,000 fr. (£800.)

I saw the Spanish bass in Paris twenty-two years ago, and you can see it any day this month you like; for it is the identical violoncello now on show at Kensington, numbered 188. Who would divine its separate adventures, to see it all reposing so calm and uniform in that case—" Post tot naufragia tutus."

THIRD LETTER.

August 27th, 1872.

"THE Spanish bass" is of the grand pattern and exquisitely made: the sound-hole, rather shorter and stiffer than in Stradivarius's preceding epoch, seems stamped out of the wood with a blow, so swiftly and surely is it cut. The purfling is perfection. Look at the section of it in the upper-bought of the back. The scroll extremely elegant. The belly is a beautiful piece of wood. The back is of excellent quality, but mean in the figure. The sides are cut the wrong way of the grain; a rare mistake in this master. The varnish sweet, clear, orange-coloured, and full of fire. Oh, if this varnish could but be laid on the wood of the Sanctus Seraphin bass! The belly is full of cracks, and those cracks have not been mended without several lines of modern varnish clearly visible to the practised eye.

Some years ago there was a Stradivarius bass in Ireland. I believe it was presented by General Oliver to Signor Piatti. I never saw it; but some people tell me that in wood and varnish it surpasses the Spanish bass. Should these lines meet Signor Piatti's eye, I will only say that, if he would allow it to be placed in the case for a single week, it would be a great boon to the admirers of these rare and noble pieces, and very instructive. By the side of the Spanish bass stands another, inferior to it in model and general work, superior to it in preservation, No. 187. The unhappy parts are the wood of the sides and the scroll. Bad wood kills good varnish. The scroll is superb in workmanship; it is more finely cut at the back part than the scroll of the Spanish bass; but it is cut out of a pear tree, and that abominable wood gets uglier if possible under varnish, and lessens the effect even of first-class work. On the other hand, the back and belly, where the varnish gets fair play, are beautiful. The belly is incomparable. Here is the very finest ruby varnish of Stradiarius, as pure as the day it was laid on. The back was the same colour originally, but has been reduced in tint by the friction this part of a bass encounters when played on. The varnish on the back is chipped all over in a manner most picturesque to the cultivated eye; only it must go no farther. I find on examination that these chips have all been done a good many years ago, and I can give you a fair, though of course not an exact, idea of the process. Methinks I see an old gentleman seated sipping his last glass of port in the dining-room over a shining table, whence the cloth was removed for dessert. He wears a little powder still, though no longer the fashion; he has no shirt-collar, but a roll of soft and snowy cambric round his neck, a plain gold pin, and a frilled bosom. He has a white waistcoat—snow-white like his linen: he washes at home—and a blue coat with gilt buttons. Item, a large fob or watch-pocket, whence bulges a golden turnip, and puts forth seed, to wit a bunch of seals and watch-keys, with perhaps a gold pencil-case. One of these seals is larger than the others: the family arms are engraved on it, and only important letters are signed with it. He rises and goes to the drawing-room. The piano is opened; a servant brings the Stradiarius bass from the study; the old gentleman takes it and tunes it, and, not to be bothered with his lapels, buttons his coat, and plays his part in a quartett of Haydn or a symphony of Corelli, and smiles as he plays, because he really loves music, and is not overweighted. Your modern amateur, with a face of justifiable agony, ploughs the hill of Beethoven and harrows the soul of Reade. Nevertheless, my smiling senior is all the time bringing the finest and most delicate varnish of Stradiarius into a series of gentle collisions with the following objects:—First, the gold pin; then the two rows of brass buttons; and last, not least, the male chatelaine of the period. There is an oval chip just off the centre of this bass; I give the armorial seal especial credit for that: “à tout seigneur tout honneur.”

Take another specimen of eccentric wear: the red Stradiarius kit 88. The enormous oval wear has been done thus:—It has belonged to a dancing-master, and he has clapped it under his arm fifty times a day to show his pupils the steps.

The Guarnerius family consisted of Andreas, his two sons Petrus and Joseph, his grandson Petrus Guarnerius of Venice and Joseph Guarnerius, the greatest of the family, whom Mons. Fétis considers identical with Guiseppe Antonio, born in 1683. There are, however, great difficulties in the way of this theory, which I will reserve for my miscellaneous remarks.

Andreas Guarnerius was the closest of all the copyists of the Amati; so close, indeed, that his genuine violins are nearly always sold as Amati. Unfortunately he imitated the small pattern. His wood and varnish are exactly like Amati; there is, however, a peculiar way of cutting the lower wing of his sound-holes that betrays him at once. When you find him with the border high and broad, and the purfling grand, you may suspect his son Petrus of helping him, for his own style is petty. His basses few, but fine. Petrus Guarnerius of Cremona makes violins prodigiously bombés, and more adapted to grumbling inside than singing out; but their appearance magnificent: a grand deep border, very noble, sound-hole and scroll Amatisé, and a deep orange varnish that nothing can surpass. His violins are singularly scarce in England. I hope to see one at the Exhibition before it closes.

Joseph, his brother, is a thorough original. His violins are narrowed under the shoulder in a way all his own. As to model, his fiddles are bombés like his brother's; and, as the centre has generally sunk from weakness, the violin presents a great bump at the upper part and another at the lower. The violin 97 is by this maker, and is in pure and perfect condition; but the wood having no figure, the beauty of the varnish is not appreciated. He is the king of the varnishers. He was the first man at Cremona that used red varnish often: than pale, and in that respect was the teacher even of Stradivarius. When this maker deviates from his custom and puts really good hare-wood into a violin, then his glorious varnish gets fair play, and nothing can live beside him. The other day a violin of this make with fine wood, but undersized, was put up at an auction without a name. I suppose nobody knew the maker, for it was sold on its merits, and fetched £160. I brought that violin into the country; gave a dealer £24 for it in Paris.

He made a very few flatter violins, that are worth any money.

Petrus Guarnerius, the son of this Joseph, learned his business in Cremona, but migrated early to Venice. He worked there from 1725 to 1746. He made most beautiful tenors and basses, but was not so happy in his violins. His varnish very fine, but paler than his father's.

Joseph Guarnerius, of Cremona, made violins from about 1725 to 1745. His first epoch is known only to connoisseurs; in outline it is hewed out under the shoulder like the fiddles of Joseph, son of Andrew, who was then an old fiddle-maker; but the model all his own; even, regular, and perfect. Sound-hole long and characteristic, head rather mean for him; he made but few of these essays, and then went to a different and admirable style, a most graceful and elegant violin, which has been too loosely described as a copy of Stradiuarius; it is not that, but a fine violin in which a downright good workman profits by a great contemporary artist's excellences, yet without servility. These violins are not longer nor stiffer in the inner bout than Stradiuarius: they are rather narrow than broad below cut after the plan of Stradiuarius, though not so well, in the central part, the sound-holes exquisitely cut, neither too stiff nor too flowing, the wood between the curves of the sound-holes remarkably broad. The scroll grandiose, yet well cut, and the nozzle of the scroll and the little platform. They are generally purfled through both pegs, like Stradiuarius; the wood very handsome, varnish a rich golden brown. I brought three of this epoch into the country; one was sold the other day at Christie's for £260, (bought, I believe, by Lord Dunmore,) and is worth £350 as prices go. This epoch, unfortunately, is not yet represented in the collection.

The next epoch is nobly represented by 93, 94, 95. All these violins have the broad centre, the grand long inner bout, stiffish yet not ungraceful, the long and rather upright sound-hole, but well cut; the grand scroll, cut all in a hurry, but noble. 93 is a little the grander in make I think; the purfling being set a hair's breadth farther in, the scroll magnificent; but observe the haste—the deep gauge-marks on the side of the scroll; here is already an indication of the slovenliness to come: varnish a lovely orange, wood beautiful; two cracks in the belly, one from the chin-mark to the sound-hole. 94 is a violin of the same make, and without a single crack; the scroll is not quite so grandiose as 93, but the rest incomparable; the belly pure and beautiful, the back a picture. There is nothing in the room that equals in picturesqueness the colours of this magnificent piece: time and fair-play have worn it thus; first, there is a narrow irregular line of wear caused by the hand in shifting, next comes a sheet of ruby varnish, with no wear to speak of; then an irregular piece is worn out the size of a sixpence; then more varnish; then, from the centre downwards, a grand wear, the size and shape of a large curving pear; this ends in a broad zigzag ribbon of varnish, and then comes the bare wood caused by the friction in playing, but higher up to the left a score of great bold chips. It is the very beau-ideal of the red Cremona violin, adorned, not injured, by a century's fair wear. No 95 is a roughish specimen of the same epoch, not so brilliant, but with its own charm. Here the gauge-marks of impatience are to be seen in the very border, and I should have expected to see the stiff-throated scroll, for it belongs to this form.

The next epoch is rougher still, and is generally, but not always, higher built, with a stiff-throated scroll, and a stiff, quaint sound-hole that is the delight of connoisseurs; and such is the force of genius that I believe in our secret hearts we love these impudent fiddles best—they are so full of chic. After that, he abuses the patience of his admirers; makes his fiddles of a preposterous height, with sound-holes long enough for a tenor; but, worst of all, indifferent wood and downright bad varnish—varnish worthy only of the Guadagnini tribe, and not laid on by the method of his contemporaries. Indeed, I sadly fear it was this great man who, by his ill-example in 1740-45, killed the varnish of Cremona. Thus—to show the range of the subject—out of five distinct epochs in the work of this extraordinary man we have only one and a half, so to speak, represented even in this noble collection—the greatest by far the world has ever seen. But I hope to see all these gaps filled, and also to see in the collection a Stradivarius violin of that kind I call the dolphin-backed. This is a mere matter of picturesque wear. When a red Stradivarius violin is made of soft velvety wood, and the varnish is just half worn off the back in a rough triangular form, that produces a certain beauty of light and shade which is in my opinion the ne plus ultra. These violins are rare. I never had but two in my life. A very obliging dealer, who knows my views, has promised his co-operation, and I think England, which cuts at present rather too poor a figure in respect of this maker, will add a dolphin-backed Stradivarius to the collection before it is dispersed.

CARLO BERGONZI, if you go by gauging and purfling, is of course an inferior make to the Amati; but, if that is to be the line of reasoning, he is superior to Joseph Guarnerius. We ought to be in one story; if Joseph Guarnerius is the second maker of Cremona, it follows that Carlo Bergonzi is the third. Fine size, reasonable outline, flat and even model, good wood, work, and varnish, and an indescribable air of grandeur and importance. He is quite as rare as Joseph Guarnerius. Twenty-five years ago I ransacked Europe for him—for he is a maker I always loved—and I could obtain but few. No. 109 was one of them, and the most remarkable, take it altogether. In this one case he has really set himself to copy Stradiarius. He has composed his purfling in the same proportions, which was not at all his habit. He has copied the sound-hole closely, and has even imitated that great man's freak of delicately hollowing out the lower wood-work of the sound-hole. The varnish of this violin is as fine in colour as any pale Stradiarius in the world, and far superior in body to most of them; but that is merely owing to its rare preservation. Most of these pale Stradiariuses, and especially Mrs. Jay's and No. 86, had once varnish on them as beautiful as is now on this chef-d'œuvre of Carlo Bergonzi.

Monsieur Fétis having described Michael Angelo Bergonzi as a pupil of Stradiarius, and English writers having blindly followed him, this seems a fit place to correct that error. Michael Angelo Bergonzi was the son of Carlo; began to work after the death of Stradiarius, and imitated nobody but his father—and him vilely. His corners are not corners, but peaks. See them once, you never forget them; but you pray Heaven you may never see them again. His ticket runs, "Michel Angelo Bergonzi figlio di Carlo, fece nel Cremona," from 1750 to 1780. Of Nicholas, son of Michael Angelo, I have a ticket dated 1796, but he doubtless began before that and worked till 1830. He lived till 1838, was well known to Tarisio, and it is from him alone we have learned the house Stradiarius lived in. There is a tenor by Michael Angelo Bergonzi to be seen at Mr. Cox, the picture dealer, Pall-mall, and one by Nicholas, in Mr. Chanut's shop, in Wardour-street. Neither of these Bergonzi knew how their own progenitor varnished any more than my housemaid does.

STAINER, a mixed maker. He went to Cremona too late to unlearn his German style, but he moderated it, and does not scoop so badly as his successors. The model of his tenor, especially the back, is very fine. The peculiar defect of it is that it is purfled too near the border, which always gives meanness. This is the more unfortunate, that really he was freer from this defect than his imitators. He learned to varnish in Cremona, but his varnish is generally paler than the native Cremonese. This tenor is exceptional: it has a rose-coloured varnish that nothing can surpass. It is lovely.

SANCTUS SERAPHIN.—This is a true Venetian maker. The Venetian born was always half-Cremonese, half-German. In this bass, which is his uniform style, you see a complete mastery of the knife and the gauge. Neither the Stradivarius nor the Amati ever purfled a bass more finely, and, to tell the truth, rarely so finely. But oh! the miserable scroll, the abominable sound-hole! Here he shows the cloven foot, and is more German than Stainer. Uniformity was never carried so far as by this natty workman; one violin exactly like the next; one bass the image of its predecessor. His varnish never varies. It is always slightly opaque. This is observed in his violins, but it escapes detection in his basses, because it is but slight, after all, and the wonderful wood he put into his basses, shines through that slight defect and hides it from all but practised eyes. He had purchased a tree or a very large log of it; for this is the third bass I have seen of this wonderful wood. Now-a-days you might cut down a forest of sycamore and not match it; those veteran trees are all gone. He has a feature all to himself; his violins have his initials in ebony let into the belly under the broad part of the tail-piece. This natty Venetian is the only old violin maker I know who could write well. The others bungle that part of the date they are obliged to write in the tickets. This one writes it in a hand like copper plate, whence I suspect he was himself the engraver of his ticket, which is unique. It is four times the size of a Cremonese ticket, and has a scroll border composed thus:—The sides of a parallelogram are created by four solid lines like sound-holes; these are united at the sides by two leaves and at the centre by two shells. Another serpentine line is then coiled all round them at short intervals, and within the parallelogram the ticket is printed:—

Sanctus Seraphin Utinensis,
Fecit Venetiis, anno 17—.

THE MIGHTY VENETIAN.—I come now to a truly remarkable piece, a basso di camera that comes modestly into the room without a name, yet there is nothing except No. 91 that sends such a thrill through the true connoisseur. The outline is grotesque but original, the model full and swelling but not bumpy, the wood detestable; the back is hare-wood, but without a vestige of figure; so it might just as well be elm: the belly, instead of being made of mountain deal grown on the sunny side of the Alps, is a piece of house timber. Now these materials would kill any other maker; yet this mighty bass stands its ground. Observe the fibre of the belly; here is the deepest red varnish in the room, and laid on with an enormous brush. Can you see the fibre through the thin varnish of Sanctus Seraphin as plainly as you can see the fibre through this varnish laid on as thick as paint? So much for clearness. Now for colour. Let the student stand before this bass, get the varnish into his mind, and then walk rapidly to any other instrument in the room he has previously determined to compare with it. This will be a revelation to him if he has eyes in his head.

And this miracle comes in without a name, and therefore, is passed over by all the sham judges. And why does it come without a name? I hear a French dealer advised those who framed the catalogue. But the fact is that if a man once narrows his mind to three or four makers, and imagines they monopolize excellence, he never can be a judge of old instruments, the study is so wide and his mind artificially narrowed. Example of this false method: Mr. Faulconer sends in a bass, which he calls Andreas Guarnerius. An adviser does not see that, and suggests "probably by Amati." Now there is no such thing as "probably by Amati," any more than there is probably the sun or the moon. That bass is by David Tecchler, of Rome; but it is a masterpiece; and so, because he has done better than usual, the poor devil is to be robbed of his credit, and it is to be given, first to one maker who is in the ring and then to another, who is in the ring. The basso di camera, which not being in the ring, comes without a name, is by Domenico Montagnana of Venice, the greatest maker of basses in all Venice or Cremona except one. If this bass had only a decent piece of wood at the back, it would extinguish all the other basses. But we can remedy that defect. Basses by this maker exist with fine wood. Mr. Hart, senior, sold one some twenty years ago with yellow varnish, and wood striped like a tiger's back. Should these lines meet the eye of the purchaser, I shall feel grateful if he will communicate with me thereupon.

I come now to the last of the Goths, thus catalogued, No. 100, "ascribed to Guarnerius. Probably by Storioni."

Lorenzo Storioni is a maker who began to work at Cremona about 1780. He has a good model but wretched spirit varnish. Violin No. 100 is something much better. It is a violin made before 1760 by Landolfo of Milan. He is a maker well known to experienced dealers who can take their minds out of the ring, but, as the writers seem a little confused, and talk of two Landulphs, a Charles and a Ferdinand, I may as well say here that the two are one. This is the true ticket:—

Carolus Ferdinandus Landulphus, fecit Mediolani in via S. Margaritæ, anno 1756.

Stiff inner bought really something like Joseph Guarnerius; but all the rest quite unlike: scroll very mean, varnish good, and sometimes very fine. Mr. Moore's, in point of varnish, is a fine specimen. It has a deeper, nobler tint than usual. This maker is very interesting, on account of his being absolutely the last Italian who used the glorious varnish of Cremona. It died first at Cremona; lingered a year or two more at Venice; Landolfo retained it at Milan till 1760, and with him it ended.

In my next and last article I will deal with the varnish of Cremona, as illustrated by No. 91 and other specimens, and will enable the curious to revive that lost art if they choose.

FOURTH LETTER.

August 31st, 1872.

THE fiddles of Cremona gained their reputation by superior tone, but they hold it now mainly by their beauty. For thirty years past violins have been made equal in model to the chef-d'œuvres of Cremona, and stronger in wood than Stradi-narius, and more scientific than Guarnerius in the thicknesses. This class of violin is hideous, but has one quality in perfection—POWER; whilst the masterpieces of Cremona eclipse every new violin in sweetness, oiliness, crispness, and volume of tone as distinct from loudness. Age has dried their vegetable juices, making the carcass much lighter than that of a new violin, and those light dry frames vibrate at a touch.

But M. Fétis goes too far when he intimates that Stradivarius is louder as well as sweeter than Lupot, Gand, or Bernardel. Take a hundred violins by Stradivarius and open them; you find about ninety-five patched in the centre with new wood. The connecting link is a sheet of glue. And is glue a fine resonant substance? And are the glue and the new wood of John Bull and Jean Crapaud transmogrified into the wood of Stradivarius by merely sticking on to it? Is it not extravagant to quote patched violins as beyond rivalry in all the qualities of sound? How can they be the loudest, when the centre of the sound-board is a mere sandwich, composed of the maker's thin wood, a buttering of glue, and a huge slice of new wood?

Joseph Guarnerius has plenty of wood; but his thicknesses are not always so scientific as those of the best modern fiddle-makers; so that even he can be rivalled in power by a new violin, though not in richness and sweetness. Consider, then, these two concurrent phenomena, that for twenty-five years new violins have been better made for sound than they ever were made in this world, yet old Cremona violins have nearly doubled in price, and, you will divine, as the truth is, that old fiddles are not bought by the ear alone. I will add that 100 years ago, when the violins of Brescia and of Stradivarius and Guarnerius were the only well-modelled violins, they were really bought by the ear, and the prices were moderate. Now they are in reality bought by the eye, and the price is enormous. The reason is that their tone is good but their appearance inimitable; because the makers chose fine wood and laid on a varnish highly coloured, yet clear as crystal, with this strange property—it becomes far more beautiful by time and usage: it wears softly away, or chips boldly away, in such forms as to make the whole violin picturesque, beautiful, various, and curious.

To approach the same conclusion by a different road—No. 94 is a violin whose picturesque beauty I have described already;

twenty-five years ago Mr. Plowden gave £450 for it. It is now, I suppose, worth £500. Well, knock that violin down and crack it in two places, it will sink that moment to the value of the "violon du diable," and be worth £350. But collect twenty amateurs all ready to buy it, and, instead of cracking it, dip it into a jar of spirits and wash the varnish off. Not one of those customers will give you above £40 for it; nor would it in reality be worth quite so much in the market. Take another example. There is a beautiful and very perfect violin by Stradiuarius, which the Times, in an article on these instruments, calls La Messie. These leading journals have private information on every subject, even grammar. I prefer to call it—after the very intelligent man to whom we owe the sight of it—the Vuillaume Stradiuarius. Well, the Vuillaume Stradiuarius is worth, as times go, £600 at least. Wash off the varnish, it would be worth £35; because, unlike No 94, it has one little crack. As a further illustration that violins are heard by the eye, let me remind your readers of the high prices at which numberless copies of the old makers were sold in Paris for many years. The inventors of this art undertook to deliver a new violin, that in usage and colour of the worn parts should be exactly like an old and worn violin of some favourite maker. Now, to do this with white wood was impossible; so the wood was baked in the oven or coloured yellow with the smoke of sulphuric acid, or so forth, to give it the colour of age; but these processes kill the wood as a vehicle of sound; and these copies were, and are, the worst musical instruments Europe has created in this century; and, bad as they are at starting, they get worse every year of their untuneful existence; yet, because they flattered the eye with something like the light and shade and picturesqueness of the Cremona violin, these pseudo-antiques, though illimitable in number, sold like wildfire; and hundreds of self-deceivers heard them by the eye, and fancied these tinpots sounded divinely. The hideous red violins of Bernardel. Gand, and an English maker or two, are a reaction against those copies; they are made honestly with white wood, and they will, at all events, improve in sound every year and every decade. It comes to this, then, that the varnish of Cremona, as operated on by time and usage, has an inimitable beauty, and we pay a high price for it in second-class makers, and an enormous price in a fine Stradiuarius or Joseph Guarnerius. No wonder, then, that many violin-maker have tried hard to discover the secret of this varnish; many chemists have given days and nights of anxious study to it. More than once, even in my time, hopes have run high, but only to fall again. Some have even cried Eureka! to the public: but the moment others looked at their discovery and compared it with the real thing, "inextinguishable laughter shook the skies." At last despair has succeeded to all that energetic study, and the varnish of Cremona is sullenly given up as a lost art.

I have heard and read a great deal about it, and I think I can state the principal theories briefly, but intelligibly.

1. It used to be stoutly maintained that the basis was amber; that these old Italians had the art of infusing amber without impairing its transparency; once fused, by dry heat, it could be boiled into a varnish with oil and spirit of turpentine, and combined with transparent yet lasting colours. To convince me, they used to rub the worn part of a Cremona with their sleeves, and then put the fiddle to their noses, and smell amber. Then I burning with love of knowledge, used to rub the fiddle very hard and whip it to my nose, and not smell amber. But that might arise in some measure from there not being any amber there to smell. (N. B.—These amber-seeking worthies never rubbed the coloured varnish on an old violin. Yet their theory had placed amber there.)

2. That time does it all. The violins of Stradivarius were raw, crude things at starting, and the varnish rather opaque.

3. Two or three had the courage to say it was spirit varnish, and alleged in proof that if you drop a drop of alcohol on a Stradivarius, it tears the varnish off as it runs.

4. The far more prevalent notion was that it is an oil varnish, in support of which they pointed to the rich appearance of what they call the bare wood, and contrasted the miserable hungry appearance of the wood in all old violins known to be spirit varnished—for instance, Nicholas Gagliano, of Naples, and Jean Baptiste Guadagnini, of Piacenza, Italian makers contemporary with Joseph Guarnerius.

5. That the secret has been lost by adulteration. The old Cremonese and Venetians got pure and sovereign gums, that have retired from commerce.

Now, as to theory No 1.—Surely amber is too dear a gum and too impracticable for two hundred fiddle-makers to have used in Italy. Till fused by dry heat it is no more soluble in varnish than quartz is; and who can fuse it? Copal is inclined to melt, but amber to burn, to catch fire, to do anything but melt. Put the two gums to a lighted candle, you will then appreciate the difference. I tried more than one chemist in the fusing of amber; it came out of their hands a dark brown opaque substance, rather burnt than fused. When really fused it is a dark olive green, as clear as crystal. Yet I never knew but one man who could bring it to this, and he had special machinery, invented by himself, for it; in spite of which he nearly burnt down his house at it one day. I believe the whole amber theory comes out of a verbal equivoque; the varnish of the Amati was called amber to mark its rich colour, and your a priori reasoners went off on that, forgetting that amber must be an inch thick to exhibit the colour of amber. By such reasoning as this Mr. Davidson, in a book of great general merit, is misled so far as to put down powdered glass for an ingredient in Cremona varnish. Mark the logic. Glass in a sheet is transparent; so if you reduce it to powder it will add transparency to varnish. Imposed on by this chimera, he actually puts powdered glass, an opaque and insoluble sediment, into four receipts for Cremona varnish.

But the theories 2, 3, 4, 5 have all a good deal of truth in them; their fault is that they are too narrow, and too blind to the truth of each other. IN THIS, AS IN EVERY SCIENTIFIC INQUIRY, THE TRUE SOLUTION IS THAT WHICH RECONCILES ALL THE TRUTHS THAT SEEM AT VARIANCE.

The way to discover a lost art, once practised with variations by a hundred people, is to examine very closely the most brilliant specimen, the most characteristic specimen, and, indeed, the most extravagant, specimen—if you can find one. I took that way, and I found in the chippiest varnish of Stradiuarius, viz., his dark red varnish, the key to all the varnish of Cremona, red or yellow. (N.B.—The yellow always beat me dead, till I got to it by this detour.) There is no specimen in the collection of this red varnish so violent as I have seen; but Mr. Pawle's bass, No. 187, will do. Please walk with me up to the back of that bass, and let us disregard all hypotheses and theories, and use our eyes. What do we see before us? A bass with a red varnish that chips very readily off what people call the baro wood. But never mind what these echoes of echoes call it. What is it?

It is not bare wood. Bare wood turns a dirty brown with age. This is a rich and lovely yellow. By its colour and its glassy gloss, and by disbelieving what echoes say and trusting only to our eyes, we may see at a glance it is not bare wood, but highly varnished wood. This varnish is evidently oil, and contains a gum. Allowing for the tendency of oil to run into the wood, I should say four coats of oil varnish : and this they call the bare wood. We have now discovered the first process: a clear oil varnish laid on the white wood with some transparent gum not high coloured. Now proceed a step further; the red and chippy varnish, what is that? "Oh, that is a varnish of the same quality but another colour," say the theorists No. 4. "How do you know?" say I. "It is self-evident. Would a man begin with oil varnish and then go into spirit varnish?" is their reply. Now observe, this is not humble observation, it is only rational preconception. But if discovery has an enemy in the human mind, that enemy is preconception. Let us then trust only to humble observation. Here is a clear varnish without the ghost of a chip in its nature; and upon it is a red varnish that is all chip. Does that look as if the two varnishes were homogeneous? Is chip precisely the same thing as no chip? If homogeneous, there would be chemical affinity between the two. But this extreme readiness of the red varnish to chip away from the clear marks a defect of chemical affinity between the two. Why, if you were to put your thumbnail against that red varnish, a little piece would come away directly. This is not so in any known case of oil upon oil. Take old Forster, for instance; he begins with clear oil varnish; then on that he puts a distinct oil varnish with the colour and transparency of pea-soup. You will not get his pea-soup to chip off his clear varnish in a hurry. There is a bass by William Forster in the collection a hundred years old; but the wear is confined to the places where the top varnish must go in a played bass. Everywhere else his pea-soup sticks tight to his clear varnish, being oil upon oil.

Now, take a perfectly distinct line of observation. In varnishes oil is a diluent of colour. It is not in the power of man to charge an oil varnish with colour so highly as the top varnish of Mr. Pawle's bass is charged. And it must be remembered that the clear varnish below has filled all the pores of the wood; therefore the diluent cannot escape into the wood, and so leave the colour undiluted; if that red varnish was ever oil varnish, every particle of the oil must be there still. What, in that mere film so crammed with colour? Never! Nor yet in the top varnish of the Spanish bass, which is thinner still, yet more charged with colour than any topaz of twice the thickness. This, then, is how Antonius Stradiarius varnished Mr. Pawle's bass.—He began with three or four coats of oil varnish containing some common gum. He then laid on several coats of red varnish, made by simply dissolving some fine red unadulterated gum in spirit; the spirit evaporated and left pure gum lying on a rich oil varnish, from which it chips by its dry nature and its utter want of chemical affinity to the substratum. On the Spanish bass Stradiarius put not more, I think, than two coats of oil varnish, and then a spirit varnish consisting of a different gum, less chippy, but even more tender and wearable than the red. Now take this key all round the room, and you will find there is not a lock it will not open. Look at the varnish on the back of the "violon du diable," as it is called. There is a top varnish with all the fire of a topaz and far more colour; for slice the deepest topaz to that thinness, it would pale before that varnish. And why? 1st. Because this is no oily dilution; it is a divine unadulterated gum, left there undiluted by evaporation of the spirituous vehicle. 2nd. Because this varnish is a jewel with the advantage of a foil behind it; that foil is the fine oil varnish underneath. The purest specimen of Stradiarius's red varnish in the room is, perhaps, Mr. Fountaine's kit. Look at the back of it by the light of these remarks. What can be plainer than the clear oil varnish with not the ghost of a chip in it, and the glossy top varnish, so charged with colour, and so ready to chip from the varnish below, for want of chemical affinity between the varnishes? The basso di camera by Montagnana is the same thing. See the bold wear on the back revealing the heterogeneous varnish below the red. They are all the same thing. The palest violins of Stradiarius and Amati are much older and harder worn than Mr. Pawle's bass, and the top varnish not of a chippy character: yet look at them closely by the light of these remarks, and you shall find one of two phenomena—either the tender top varnish has all been worn away, and so there is nothing to be inferred one way or other, or else there are flakes of it left; and, if so, these flakes, however thin, shall always betray, by the superior vividness of their colour to the colour of the subjacent oil varnish, that they are not oil varnish, but pure gum left there by evaporating spirit on a foil of beautiful old oil varnish. Take Mrs. Jay's Amatisé Stradiuarius; on the back of that violin towards the top there is a mere flake of top varnish left by itself; all round it is nothing left but the bottom varnish. That fragment of top varnish is a film thinner than gold leaf; yet look at its intensity; it lies on the fine old oil varnish like fixed lighting, it is so vivid. It is just as distinct from the oil varnish as is the red varnish of the kit. Examine the Duke of Cambridge's violin, or any other Cremona instrument in the whole world you like; it is always the same thing, though not so self-evident as in the red and chippy varnishes. The Vuillaume Stradiuarius, not being worn, does not assist us in this particular line of argument; but it does not contradict us. Indeed, there are a few little chips in the top varnish of the back, and they reveal a heterogeneous varnish below, with its rich yellow colour like the bottom varnish of the Pawle bass. Moreover, if you look at the top varnish closely you shall see what you never see in a new violin of our day; not a vulgar glare upon the surface, but a gentle inward fire. Now that inward fire, I assure you, is mainly caused by the oil varnish below; the orange varnish above has a heterogeneous foil below. That inward glow is characteristic of all foils. If you could see the Vuillaume Stradiuarius at night and move it about in the light of a candle, you would be amazed at the fire of the foil and the refraction of light.

Thus, then, it is. The unlucky phrase "varnish of Cremona" has weakened men's powers of observation by fixing a preconceived notion that the varnish must be all one thing. THE LOST SECRET IS THIS. THE CREMONA VARNISH IS NOT A VARNISH, BUT TWO VARNISHES; AND THOSE VARNISHES ALWAYS HETEROGENEOUS: THAT IS TO SAY, FIRST THE PORES OF THE WOOD ARE FILLED AND THE GRAIN SHOWN UP BY ONE, BY TWO, BY THREE, AND SOMETIMES, THOUGH RARELY, BY FOUR COATS OF FINE OIL VARNISH WITH SOME COMMON BUT CLEAR GUM IN SOLUTION. THEN UPON THIS OIL VARNISH, WHEN DRY, IS LAID A HETEROGENEOUS VARNISH, VIZ. A SOLUTION IN SPIRIT OF SOME SOVEREIGN, HIGH COLOURED, PELLUCID, AND, ABOVE ALL, TENDER GUM. Gum-lac, which for forty years has been the mainstay of violin-makers, must never be used; not one atom of it. That vile, flinty gum killed varnish at Naples and Piacenza a hundred and forty years ago, as it kills varnish now. Old Cremona shunned it, and whoever employs a grain of it, commits wilful suicide as a Cremonese varnisher.

It will not wear ; it will not chip ; it is in every respect the opposite of the Cremona gums. Avoid it utterly, or fail hopelessly, as all varnishers have failed since that fatal gum came in. The deep red varnish of Cremona is pure dragon's blood ; not the cake, the stick, the filthy trash, which, in this sinful and adulterating generation, is retailed under that name, but the tear of dragon's blood, little lumps deeper in colour than a carbuncle, clear as crystal, and fiery as a ruby. Unadulterated dragon's blood does not exist in commerce west of Temple-bar ; but you can get it by groping in the City as hard as Diogenes had to grope for an honest man in a much less knavish town than London. The yellow varnish is the unadulterated tear of another gum, retailed in a cake like dragon's blood, and as great a fraud. All cakes and sticks presented to you in commerce as gums are audacious swindles. A true gum is the tear of a tree. For the yellow tear, as for the red, grope the City harder than Diogenes. The orange varnish of Peter Guarnerius and Stradivarius is only a mixture of these two genuine gums. Even the milder reds of Stradivarius are slightly reduced with the yellow gum. The Montagnana bass and No. 94 are pure dragon's blood mellowed down by time and exposure only.

A violin varnished as I have indicated will look a little better than other new violins from the first ; the back will look nearly as well as the Vuillaume Stradivarius, but not quite. The belly will look a little better if properly prepared ; will show the fibre of the deal better. But its principal merit is, that like the violins of Cremona, it will vastly improve in beauty if much exposed and persistently played. And that improvement will be rapid, because the tender top varnish will wear away from the oily substratum four times as quickly as any vulgar varnish of the day will chip or wear. We cannot do what Stradivarius could not do—give to a new violin the peculiar beauty, that comes to heterogeneous varnishes of Cremona from age and honest wear ; but, on the other hand, it is a mistake to suppose that one hundred years are required to develop the beauty of any Cremona varnishes, old or new. The ordinary wear of a century cannot be condensed into one year or five, but it can be condensed into twenty years. Any young amateur may live to play on a magnificent Cremona made for himself, if he has the enthusiasm to follow my directions. Choose the richest and finest wood ; have the violin made after the pattern of a rough Joseph Guarnerius ; then you need not sand-paper the back, sides, or head, for sand-paper is a great enemy to varnish; it drives more wood-dust into the pores than you can blow out. If you sand-paper the belly, sponge that finer dust out, as far as possible, and varnish when dry. That will do no harm, and throw up the fibre. Make your own linseed oil—the linseed oil of commerce is adulterated with animal oil and fish oil, which are non-drying oils—and varnish as I have indicated above, and when the violin is strung treat it regularly with a view to fast wear; let it hang up in a warm place, exposed to dry air, night and day. Never let it be shut up in a case except for transport. Lend it for months to the leader of an orchestra. Look after it, and see that it is constantly played and constantly exposed to dry air all about it. Never clean it, never touch it with a silk handkerchief. In twenty years your heterogeneous varnishes will have parted company in many places. The back will be worn quite picturesque; the belly will look as old as Joseph Guarnerius; there will be a delicate film on the surface of the grand red varnish mellowed by exposure, and a marvellous fire below. In a word, you will have a glorious Cremona fiddle. Do you aspire to do more, and to make a downright old Cremona violin? Then, my young friend, you must treat yourself as well as the violin; you must not smoke all day, nor the last thing at night; you must never take a dram before dinner and call it bitters; you must be as true to your spouse as ever you can, and, in a word, live moderately, and cultivate good temper and avoid great wrath. By these means, Deo volente, you shall live to see the violin that was made for you and varnished by my receipt, as old and worn and beautiful a Cremona as the Joseph Guarnerius No. 94, beyond which nothing can go.

To show the fiddle-maker what may be gained by using as little sand-paper as possible, let him buy a little of Maunder's palest copal varnish; then let him put a piece of deal on his bench and take a few shavings off it with a carpenter's plane. Let him lay his varnish directly on the wood so planed. It will have a fire and a beauty he will never quite attain to by scraping, sand-papering, and then varnishing the same wood with the same varnish. And this applies to hare-wood as well as deal. The back of the Vuillaume Stradiarius, which is the finest part, has clearly not been sand-papered in places, so probably not at all. Wherever it is possible, varnish after cold steel, at all events in imitating the Cremonese, and especially Joseph Guarnerius. These, however, are minor details, which I have only inserted, because I foresee that I may be unable to return to this subject in writing, though I shall be very happy to talk about it at my own place to any one who really cares about the matter. However, it is not every day one can restore a lost art to the world ; and I hope that, and my anxiety not to do it by halves, will excuse this prolix article.

THE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "OBSERVER."

THIS great annual race has become a national event. The rival crews are watched by a thousand keen eyes from the moment they appear on the Thames; their trials against time or scratch crews are noted and reported to the world; criticism and speculation are unintermittent, and the Press prints two hundred volumes about the race before ever it is run.

When the day comes England suspends her liberties for an hour or two, makes her police her legislators; and her river, though by law a highway, becomes a race course; passengers and commerce are both swept off it not to spoil sacred sport; London pours out her myriads; the country flows in to meet them; the roads are clogged with carriages and pedestrians all making for the river; its banks on both sides are blackened by an unbroken multitude five miles long; on all the bridges that command the race people hang and cluster like swarming bees; windows, seats, balconies, are crammed, all glowing with bright colours (blue predominating), and sparkling with brighter eyes of the excited fair ones.

The two crews battle over the long course under one continuous roar of a raging multitude. At last—and often after fluctuations in the race that drive the crowd all but mad—there is a puff of smoke, a loud report, one boat has won, though both deserve; and the victors are the true kings of all that mighty throng; in that hour the Premier of England, the Primate, the poet, the orator, the philosopher of his age, would walk past unheeded if the Stroke oar of the victorious boat stood anywhere near.

To cynics and sedentary students all this seems childish, and looks like paying to muscle a homage that is never given by acclamation to genius and virtue.

But, as usual, the public is not far wrong; the triumph, though loud, is evanescent, and much has been done and endured to earn it. No glutton, no wine-bibber, no man of impure life could live through that great pull; each victor abstinuit venere et vino, sudavit et alsit.

The captain of the winning boat has taught Government a lesson; for in selecting his men he takes care of Honour, and does not take care of Dowb, for that would be to throw the race away upon dry land; but the public enthusiasm rests on broader and more obvious grounds than these. Every nation has a right to admire its own traits in individuals, when those traits are honourable and even innocent. England is not bound to admire those athletes, who every now and then proclaim their nationality by drinking a quart of gin right off for a wager; but we are a nation great upon the water, and great at racing, and we have a right to admire these men, who combine the two things to perfection. This is the king of races, for it is run by the king of animals working, after his kind, by combination, and with a concert so strong, yet delicate, that for once it eclipses machinery. But, above all, here is an example, not only of strength, wind, spirit, and pluck indomitable, but of pure and crystal honour. Foot races and horse races have been often sold, and the betters betrayed; but this race never—and it never will be. Here, from first to last, all is open, because all is fair and glorious as the kindred daylight it courts. We hear of shivering stable boys sent out on a frosty morning to try race horses on the sly, and so give the proprietors private knowledge to use in betting. Sometimes these early worms have been preceded by earlier ones, who are watching behind a hedge. Then shall the trainer whisper one of the boys to hold in the faster horse, and so enact a profitable lie. Not so the University crews; they make trials in broad daylight for their own information; and those trials are always faithful. The race is pure, and is a strong corrective annually administered to the malpractices of racing. And so our two great fountains of learning are one fount of honour, God be thanked for it! So the people do well to roar their applause, and every nobleman who runs horses may be proud to take for his example these high-spirited gentlemen, who nobly run a nobler creature, for they run themselves. The recent feature of this great race has been the recovery of Cambridge in 1870 and 1871, after nine successive defeats; defeats the more remarkable that up to 1861 Oxford was behind her in the number of victories. The main cause of a result so peculiar was that system of rowing Oxford had invented and perfected. The true Oxford stroke is slow in the water but swift in the air; the rower goes well forward, drops his oar clean into the water, goes well backward, and makes his stroke, but, this done, comes swiftly forward all of a piece, hands foremost. Thus, though a slow stroke, it is a very busy one. Add to this a clean feather, and a high sweep of the oars to avoid rough water, and you have the true Oxford stroke, which is simply the perfection of rowing, and can, of course, be defeated by superior strength or bottom; but, cæteris paribus, is almost sure to win.

Nine defeats were endured by Cambridge with a fortitude, a patience, and a temper that won every heart, and in 1870 she reaped her reward. She sent up a crew, led by Mr. Goldie—who had been defeated the year before by Darbishire's Oxford eight—and coached by Mr. Morrison. This Cambridge crew pulled the Oxford stroke, or nearly, drove Oxford in the race to a faster stroke that does not suit her, and won the race with something to spare, though stuck to indomitably by Darbishire and an inferior crew. In 1871 Oxford sent up a heavy crew, with plenty of apparent strength, but not the precision and form of Mr. Goldie's eight. Cambridge took the lead and kept it.

This year Oxford was rather unlucky in advance. The city was circumnavigable by little ships, and you might have tacked an Indiaman in Magdalen College meadow; but this was unfavourable to eight-oar practice. Then Mr. Lesley, the stroke, sprained his side, and resigned his post to Mr. Houblon a very elegant oarsman, but one who pulls a quick stroke, not healthy to Oxford on Father Thames his bosom. Then their boat was found to be not so lively as the Cambridge boat built by Clasper. A new boat was ordered, and she proved worse in another way than Salter's. In a word Oxford came to the scratch to-day with a good stiff boat, not lively, with 20lb. more dead weight inside the coxswain's jacket, and with a vast deal of pluck and not a little Hemiplegia. The betting was five to two against her.

Five minutes before the rivals came out it was snowing so hard that the race bade fair to be invisible. I shall not describe the snow, nor any of the atmospheric horrors that made the whole business purgatory instead of pleasure. I take a milder revenge ; I only curse them.

Putney roared ; and out came the Dark Blue crew ; they looked strong and wiry, and likely to be troublesome attendants. Another roar, and out came the Light Blue. So long as the boats were stationary one looked as likely as the other to win.

They started. Houblon took it rather easy at first ; and Cambridge obtained a lead directly, and at the Soap Works was half a length ahead. This was reduced by Mr. Hall's excellent steering a foot or two by the time they shot Hammersmith Bridge. As the boats neared Chiswick Eyot, where many a race has changed, Oxford gradually reduced the lead to a foot or two ; and if this could have been done with the old, steady, much-enduring stroke, I would not have given much for the leading boat's chance. But it was achieved by a stroke of full thirty-nine to the minute, and neither form nor time was perfect. Mr. Goldie now called upon his crew, and the Clasper boat showed great qualities ; it shot away visibly, like a horse suddenly spurred ; this spurt proved that Cambridge had great reserves of force, and Oxford had very little. Houblon and his gallant men struggled nobly and unflinchingly on ; but, between Barnes Bridge and Mortlake, Goldie put the steam on again, and increased the lead to about a length and a half clear water. The gun was fired, and Cambridge won the race of 1872.

In this race Oxford, contrary to her best traditions, pulled a faster stroke than Cambridge ; the Oxford coxwain's experience compensated for his greater weight. The lighter coxwain steered his boat in and out a bit, and will run some risk of being severely criticised by all our great contemporaries—except Zig-Zag. As for me, my fifty summers or fifty winters—there is no great difference in this island of the blessed, they are neither of them so horrible as the spring—have disinclined me to thunder on the young. A veteran journalist perched on the poop of a steam vessel has many advantages. He has a bird's eye view of the Thames, and can steer Clasper's boat with his mind far more easily than can a youngster squatted four inches above the water, with eight giants intercepting his view of a strange river, and a mob shouting in his ears like all the wild beasts of a thousand forests.

Mr. Goldie has done all his work well for months. He chose his men impartially, practised them in time, and finally rowed the race with perfect judgment. He took an experimental time, and finding he could hold it, made no premature call upon his crew. He held the race in hand, and won it from a plucky opponent without distressing his men needlessly. No man is a friend of Oxford, who tells her to overrate accidents, and underrate what may be done by a wise President before ever the boats reach Putney. This London race was virtually won at Cambridge. Next year let Oxford choose her men from no favourite schools or colleges, lay aside her prejudice against Clasper, and give him a trial; at all events, return to her swinging stroke, and practise till not only all the eight bodies go like one, but all the eight rowlocks ring like one; and the spirit and bottom that enabled her to hang so long on the quarter of a first-rate crew in a first-rate boat will be apt to land her a winner in the next and many a hard-fought race.

CHARLES READE.

BUILDERS' BLUNDERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE."

FIRST LETTER.

SIR.—Amidst the din of arms abroad and petty politics at home, have you a corner for a subject less exciting, but very important to Englishmen? Then let me expose that great blot upon the English intellect, the thing we call A HOUSE, especially as it is built in our streets, rows, and squares.

To begin at the bottom—the drains are inside and hidden; nobody knows their course. A foul smell arises: it has to be groped for, and half the kitchen and scullery floors taken up—blunder 1. Drains ought to be outside: and, if not, their course be marked, with the graving tool, on the stones, and a map of the drains deposited with a parish officer; overlying boards and stones ought to be hinged, to facilitate examination. Things capable of derangement should never be inaccessible. This is common sense; yet, from their drains to their chimneypots, the builders defy this maxim.

The kitchen windows are sashes, and all sash-windows are a mistake. They are small; they ought to be as large as possible. The want of light in kitchens is one of the causes why female servants—though their lot is a singularly happy one—are singularly irritable. But, not to dwell on small errors, the next great blunder in the kitchen is THE PLASTER CEILING.

The plaster ceiling may pass, with London builders, for a venerable antiquity that nothing can disturb, but to scholars it is an unhappy novelty, and, in its present form, inexcusable.

It was invented in a tawdry age as a vehicle of florid ornamentation; but what excuse can there be for a plain plaster ceiling? Count the objections to it in a kitchen. 1. A kitchen is a low room, and the ceiling makes it nine inches lower. 2. White is a glaring colour, and a white ceiling makes a low room look lower. 3. This kitchen ceiling is dirty in a month's wear, and filthy in three months, with the smoke of gas, and it is a thing the servants cannot clean. 4. You cannot hang things on it.

Now change all this: lay out the prime cost of the ceiling, and a small part of its yearly cost, in finishing your joists and boards to receive varnish, and in varnishing them with three coats of good copal. Your low room is now nine inches higher, and looks three feet. You can put in hooks and staples galore, and make the roof of this business-room useful; it is, in colour, a pale amber at starting, which is better for the human eye than white glare, and, instead of getting uglier every day, as the plaster ceiling does, it improves every month, every year, every decade, every century. Clean deal, under varnish, acquires in a few years a beauty oak can never attain to. So much for the kitchen.

The kitchen stairs, whether of stone or wood, ought never to be laid down without a protecting nozzle. The brass nozzle costs some money, the lead nozzle hardly any: no nozzle can be dear; for it saves the steps, and they are dearer. See how the kitchen steps are cut to pieces for want of that little bit of forethought in the builder.

We are now on the first floor. Over our heads is a blunder, the plaster ceiling, well begrimed with the smoke from the gaselier, and not cleanable by the servants: and we stand upon another blunder; here are a set of boards, not joined together. They are nailed down loose, and being of green wood they gape: now the blunder immediately below, the plaster ceiling of the kitchen, has provided a receptacle of dust several inches deep. This rises when you walk upon the floor, rises in clouds when your children run; and that dust marks your carpet in black lines, and destroys it before its time. These same boards are laid down without varnish; by this means they rot, and do not last one-half, nor, indeed, one-quarter, of their time. Moreover, the unvarnished boards get filthy at the sides before you furnish, and thus you lose the cleanest and most beautiful border possible to your carpet. So the householder is driven by the incapacity of the builder to pitiable substitutes—oil cloth, Indian matting, and stained wood, which last gets uglier every year, whereas deal boards varnished clean improve every year, every decade, every century.

I am, Sir,

Yours very truly,

CHARLES READE.

SECOND LETTER.

SIR,—When last seen I was standing on the first floor of the thing they call a house, with a blunder under my feet—unvarnished, unjoined boards; and a blunder over my head—the oppressive, glaring, plaster ceiling, full of its inevitable cracks, and foul with the smoke of only three months' gas. This room has square doors with lintels. Now all doors and doorways ought to be arched, for two reasons—first, the arch is incombustible, the lintel and breast-summer are combustible; secondly, the arch, and arched door, are beautiful; the square hole in the wall, and square door, are hideous.

SASH WINDOWS.

This room is lighted by what may be defined "the unscientific window." Here in this single structure you may see most of the intellectual vices that mark the unscientific mind. The scientific way is always the simple way; so here you have complication on complication: one half the window is to go up, the other half is to come down. The maker of it goes out of his way to struggle with Nature's laws: he grapples insanely with gravitation, and therefore he must use cords, and weights, and pulleys, and build boxes to hide them in—he is a great hider. His wooden frames move up and down wooden grooves open to atmospheric influence. What is the consequence? The atmosphere becomes humid; the wooden frame sticks in the wooden box, and the unscientific window is jammed. What ho! Send for the CURSE OF FAMILIES, the British workman! Or one of the cords breaks (they are always breaking)—send for the CURSE OF FAMILIES to patch the blunder of the unscientific builder.

Now turn to the scientific window ; it is simply a glass door with a wooden frame ; it is not at the mercy of the atmosphere ; it enters into no contest with gravitation ; it is the one rational window upon earth. If a small window, it is a single glass door, if a large window, it is two glass doors, each calmly turning on three hinges, and not fighting against God Almighty and his laws, when there is no need.

The scientific window can be cleaned by the householder's servants without difficulty or danger, not so the unscientific window.

How many a poor girl has owed broken bones to the sash-window ! Now-a-days humane masters, afflicted with unscientific windows, send for the CURSE OF FAMILIES whenever their windows are dirty ; but this costs seven or eight pounds a year, and the householder is crushed under taxes enough without having to pay this odd seven pounds per annum for the nescience of the builder.

We go up the stairs—between two blunders : the balusters are painted whereas they ought to be made and varnished in the carpenter's shop, and then put up ; varnished wood improves with time, painted deteriorates. On the other side is the domestic calamity, foul wear, invariable, yet never provided for ; furniture mounting the narrow stairs dents the wall and scratches it ; sloppy housemaids paw it as they pass, and their dirty gowns, distended by crinoline, defile it.

What is to be done then ? must the whole staircase be repainted every year, because five feet of it get dirty, or shall brains step in and protect the vulnerable part ?

The cure to this curse is chunam ; or encaustic tiles, set five feet high all up the stairs. That costs money ! Granted ; but the life of a house is not the life of a butterfly. Even the tiles are a cheap cure, for repeated paintings of the whole surface mighty soon balance the prime cost of the tiles set over a small part.

The water-closet has no fire-place. That is a blunder. Every year we have a few days' hard frost, and then, without a fire in the water-closet, the water in the pan freezes, the machinery is jammed, and the whole family endure a degree of discomfort, and even of degradation, because the builder builds in summer and forgets there is such a thing as winter.

The drawing-room presents no new feature ; but the plaster ceiling is particularly objectionable in this room, because it is under the bedrooms, where water is used freely. Now if a man spills but a pint of water in washing or bathing, it runs through directly and defiles the drawing-room ceiling. Perhaps this blunder ought to be equally divided between the ceiling and the floor above, for whenever bedroom floors shall be properly constructed they will admit of buckets of water being sluiced all over them; and, indeed, will be so treated, and washed as courageously as are sculleries and kitchens only under the present benighted system.

I pass over the third floor, and mount a wooden staircase, a terrible blunder in this part of the house, to the rooms under the roof. These rooms, if the roof was open-timbered, would give each inmate a great many cubic feet of air to breathe; so the perverse builder erects a plaster ceiling, and reduces him to a very few cubic feet of air. This, the maddest of all the ceilings, serves two characteristic purposes; it chokes and oppresses the poor devils that live under it, and it hides the roof; now the roof is the part that oftenest needs repairs, so it ought to be the most accessible part of the house, and the easiest to examine from the outside and from the inside. For this very reason Perversity in person hides it; whenever your roof or a gutter leaks, it is all groping and speculation, because your builder has concealed the inside of the roof with that wretched ceiling, and has made the outside accessible only to cats and sparrows, and the "curse of families." N.B. —Whenever that curse of families goes out on that roof to mend one hole, he makes two. Why not? thanks to the perverse builder you can't watch him, and he has got a friend a plumber.

We now rise from folly to lunacy; the roof is half perpendicular. This, in a modern house, is not merely silly, it is disgraceful to the human mind; it was all very well before gutters and pipes were invented: it was well designed to shoot off the water by the overlapping eaves: but now we run our water off by our gutters and pipes, and the roof merely feeds them; the steep roof feeds them too fast, and is a main cause of overflows. But there are many other objections to slanted roofs, especially in streets and rows:

1st. The pyramidal roof, by blocking up the air, necessitates high stacks of chimneys, which are expensive and dangerous.

2nd. The pyramidal roof presses laterally against the walls, which these precious builders make thinner the higher they raise them, and subjects the whole structure to danger.

3rd. It robs the family of a whole floor, and gives it to cats and sparrows. I say that a five-story house with a pyramidal roof is a five-story house, and with a flat roof is a six-story house.

4th. It robs the poor cockney of his country view. It is astonishing how much of the country can be seen from the roofs of most London streets. A poor fellow who works all day in a hole, might smoke his evening pipe, and see a wide tract of verdure—but the builders have denied him that; they build the roof for cats, and the “curse of families,” they do not build it for the man whose bread they eat.

5th. It robs poor families of their drying-ground.

6th. This idiotic blunder, slightly aided by a subsidiary blunder or two, murders householders and their families wholesale, destroys them by the most terrible of all deaths—burning alive.

And I seriously ask you, and any member of either House, who is not besotted with little noisy things, to consider how great a matter this is, though no political squabble can be raised about it.

Mind you, the builders are not to blame that a small, high house is, in its nature a fire trap. This is a misfortune inseparable from the shape of the structure and the nature of that terrible element. The crime of the builders lies in this, that they make no intelligent provision against a danger so evident, but side with the fire not the family.

Prejudice and habitual idiocy apart, can anything be clearer than this, that, as fire mounts and smoke stifles, all persons who are above a fire ought to be enabled to leave the house by way of the roof, as easily and rapidly as those below the fire can go out by the street door.

Now what do the builders do? They side with fire; they accumulate combustible materials on the upper floors, and they construct a steep roof most difficult and dangerous to get about on, but to the aged and infirm impossible. Are then the aged and infirm incombustible? This horrible dangerous roof the merciless wretches make so hard of access that, few are the cases, as well they know by the papers, in which a life is saved by their hard road. They open a little trap-door—horizontal, of course; always go against God Almighty, and his laws, when you can; that is the idiots' creed. This miserable aperture, scarcely big enough for a dog, is bolted or padlocked. It is seven feet from the ground. Yet the builder fixes no steps nor stairs to it; no, get at it how you can. What chance has a mixed family of escaping by this hole in case of fire. Nobody ever goes on that beastly pyramid except in case of fire; and so the bolt is almost sure to be rusty, or the key mislaid, or the steps not close; and, even if the poor wretches get the steps to the place, and heave open the trap, in spite of rust and gravitation, these delays are serious; then the whole family is to be dragged up through a dog-hole, and that is slow work, and fire is swift and smoke is stifling.

A thousand poor wretches have been clean murdered in my time by the builders with their trap-door and their pyramidal roof. Thousands more have been destroyed, as far as the builders were concerned; the fire-men and fire-escape men saved them, in spite of the builders, by means which were a disgrace to the builders.

But in my next, Sir, I will show you that in a row of houses constructed by brains not one of those tragedies could ever have taken place.—

I am, Sir,

Yours very truly,

CHARLES READE.

THIRD LETTER.

SIR,—It is a sure sign a man is not an artist, if, instead of repairing his defects, he calls in an intellectual superior to counteract them. The fire-escape is creditable to its inventor, but disgraceful to the builders. They construct a fire-trap without an escape; and so their fellow-citizens are to cudgel their brains and supply the builders' want of intelligence and humanity by an invention working from the street. The fire-escape can after all save but a few of the builders' victims. The only universal fire-escape is—THE RATIONAL ROOF.

To be constructed thus: Light iron staircases from the third floor to top floor and rational roof. Flat roof, or roofs, metal covered, with scarcely perceptible fall from centre. Open joists and iron girders, the latter sufficiently numerous to keep the roof from falling in, even though fire should gut the edifice. An iron-lined door, surmounted by a sky-light; iron stair-case up to this door, which opens rationally on to the rational roof. Large cistern or tank on roof with a force-pump to irrigate the roof in fire or summer heats. Round the roof iron rails set firm in balcony, made too hard for bairns to climb, and surmounted by spikes. Between every two houses a partition gate with two locks and keys complete. Bell under cover to call neighbour in fire or other emergency.

Advantages offered by "the RATIONAL roof:"—

1. High chimney stacks not needed.
2. Nine smoking chimneys cured out of ten. There are always people at hand to make the householder believe his chimney smokes by some fault of construction, and so they gull him into expenses, and his chimney smokes on—because it is not thoroughly swept. Send a faithful servant on to the rational roof, let him see the chimney-sweep's brush at the top of every chimney before you pay a shilling, and good-bye smoking chimneys. Sweeps are rogues, and the irrational roof is their shield and buckler.
3. The rails painted chocolate and the spikes gilt would mightily improve our gloomy streets.
4. Stretch clothes' lines from spike to spike, and there is a drying-ground for the poor, or for such substantial people as are sick of the washerwomen and their villany. These heartless knaves are now rotting fine cambric and lace with soda and chloride of lime, though borax is nearly as detergent and injures nothing.
5. A playground in a purer air for children that cannot get to the parks. There is no ceiling to crack below.
6. In summer heats a blest retreat. Irrigate and cool from the cistern: then set four converging poles, stretch over these from spike to spike a few breadths of awning; and there is a delightful tent and perhaps a country view. If the Star and Garter at Richmond had possessed such a roof, they would have made at least two thousand a year upon it, and perhaps have saved their manager from a terrible death.
7. On each roof a little flagstaff and streamer to light the gloom with sparks of colour, and tell the world is the master at home or not. This would be of little use now; but, when once the rational roof becomes common, many a friend could learn from his own roof whether a friend was at home, and so men's eyes might save their legs.
8. In case of fire, the young and old would walk out by a rational door on to a rational roof, and ring at a rational gate. Then their neighbour lets them on to his rational roof, and they are safe. Meantime, the adult males, if any, have time to throw wet blankets on the skylight and turn the water on to the roof. The rational roof, after saving the family which its predecessor would have destroyed, now proceeds to combat the fire. It operates as an obstinate cowl over the fire; and, if there are engines on the spot, the victory is certain. Compare this with the whole conduct of the irrational roof. First it murdered the inmates; then it fed the fire; then it collapsed and fell on the ground floor, destroying more property, and endangering the firemen.—

Yours very truly,

CHARLES READE.

FOURTH LETTER.

SIR,—The shoe pinches all men more or less; but, on a calm survey, I think it pinches the householder hardest.

A house is as much a necessary of life as a loaf; yet this article of necessity has been lately raised to a fancy price by the trade conspiracies of the building operatives—not so much by their legitimate strikes for high wages as by their conspiring never to do for any amount of wages an honest day's work—and the fancy price thus created strikes the householder first in the form of rent. But this excessive rent, although it is an outgoing, is taxed as income; its figure is made the basis of all the imperial and parochial exactions, that crush the householder. One of these is singularly unfair; I mean "the inhabited house duty." What is this but the property tax rebaptized and levied over again, but from the wrong person? the property tax is a percentage on the rent, levied in good faith, from the person whom the rent enables to pay that percentage; but the inhabited house duty is a similar percentage on the rent, levied, under the disguise of another name, from him whom the rent disables.

In London the householder constantly builds and improves the freehold: instantly parochial spies raise his rates. He has employed labour, and so far counterbalanced pauperism; at the end of his lease the house will bear a heavier burden; but these heartless extortioners they bleed the poor wretch directly for improving parochial property at his own expense. At the end of his lease the rent is raised by the landlord on account of these taxed improvements, and the tenant turned out with a heavier grievance than the Irish farmer; yet he does not tumble his landlord, nor even a brace of vestrymen. The improving tenant, while awaiting the punishment of virtue, spends twenty times as much money in pipes as the water companies do, yet he has to pay them for water a price so enormous, that they ought to bring it into his cisterns, and indeed into his mouth, for the money.

He pays through the nose for gas.

He bleeds for the vices of the working classes; since in our wealthy cities, nine-tenths of the pauperism is simply waste and inebriety. He often pays temporary relief to an improvident workman, whose annual income exceeds his own, but who will never put by a shilling for a slack time.

In short, the respectable householder of moderate means is so ground down and oppressed that, to my knowledge, he is on the road to despondency and ripening for a revolution.

Now, I can hold him out no hope of relief from existing taxation; but his intolerable burden can be lightened by other means; the simplest is to keep down his bill for repairs and decorations, which at present is made monstrous by original misconstruction.

The irrational house is an ANIMAL WITH ITS MOUTH ALWAYS OPEN.

This need not be. It arises from causes most of which are removable; viz., 1st, from unscientific construction; 2nd, plaster ceilings; 3rd, the want of provision for partial wear 4th, the abuse of paint; 5th, hidden work.

Under all these heads I have already given examples. I will add another under head 3. The dado or skirting board is to keep furniture from marking the wall; but it is laid down only one inch thick, whereas the top of a modern chair overlaps the bottom an inch and a half. This the builders do not, or will not, observe, and so every year in London fifty thousand rooms are spoiled by the marks of chair-backs on the walls, and the owners driven to the expense of painting or papering sixty square yards, to clean a space that is less than a square foot, but fatal to the appearance of the room.

Under head 4 let me observe that God's woods are all very beautiful; that ONLY FOOLS ARE WISER THAN GOD ALMIGHTY; that varnish shows up the beauty of those woods, and adds a gloss; and that house-paint hides their beauty. Paint holds dirt, and does not wash well; varnish does. Paint can only be mixed by a workman. Varnish is sold fit to put on. Paint soon requires revival, and the old paint must be rubbed off at a great expense, and two new coats put on. Varnish stands good for years, and, when it requires revival, little more is necessary than simple cleaning, and one fresh coat, which a servant or anybody can lay on. 5. Hidden work is sure to be bad work, and so need repairs, especially in a roof, that sore tried part; and the repairs are the more expensive that the weak place has to be groped for.

I have now, I trust, said enough to awaken a few householders from the lethargy of despair, and to set them thinking a little and organizing a defence against the extraordinary mixture of stupidity and low instinctive trade cunning of which they are the victims: for a gentleman's blunders hurt himself, but a tradesman's blunders always hurt his customers; and this is singularly true of builders' blunders; they all tend one way—to compel the householder to be always sending for the builder, or that bungling rascal the plumber, to grope for his hidden work, or botch his bad work, or clean his unscientific windows, or whitewash his idiotic ceilings, or rub his nasty unguents off God's beautiful wood, and then put some more nasty odoriferous unguents on, or put cowls on his ill-cleaned chimneys; or, in short, to repair his own countless blunders at the expense of his customer.

Independently of the murderous and constant expense, the bare entrance into a modest household of that loose, lazy, drunken, dishonest drink-man and jack-man, who has the impudence to call himself "the British workman," though he never did half a day's real work at a stretch in all his life, is a serious calamity, to be averted by every lawful means.

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully.

CHARLES READE.

WHO IS HE?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent "Facing both Ways," complains that a trial, which lasted 101 days, has only revealed to him that the Tichborne Claimant is not Tichborne; who the man really is remains obscure. I think, sir, your correspondent makes his own difficulty; he overrates direct evidence, though this very trial has shown its extreme fallibility, and underrates circumstantial evidence. This is an illusion; circumstantial evidence avails to convict a man of a murder no human eye has witnessed; and à fortiori it avails to identify a pseudo-Tichborne with the man he really is. The proof of his identity lies in a number of circumstances, heterogeneous, and independent of each other, yet all pointing to one conclusion, and all undeniable, and indeed not denied. Now it is a property of such coincidences, that, when they multiply, the proof rises, not on a scale of simple addition, but in a ratio so enormous that at the sixth coincidence we get to figures the tongue may utter, but the mind cannot realize. In cases of murder I have never known a treble coincidence, pointing to one man as the murderer, fail to result in a conviction. But in the Tichborne case the barefaced coincidences, all pointing to the Tichborne Claimant as Arthur Orton, are not less than seven; and to these you may add one of superlative importance, viz., the coincidence of character. Character is the key to men's actions, and it is clear that Arthur Orton, when quite a youth, was instinctively inclined towards an imposture of the same kind, though not the same degree, that a jury has fixed upon the Tichborne Claimant. This youth, though "Begot by butchers, and by butchers bred," did yet hold his haughty head high out in Brazil, and boasted of some lofty origin or other. If your correspondent will only take a sheet of paper and write down, in separate paragraphs, all the undisputed coincidences, and then add the coincidence of character, and then add to that the circumstance that no other Arthur Orton could be found to go into the witness-box and say, "I am Arthur Orton," though those four words would have been worth fifty thousand pounds to the Claimant and his bondholders, he will see before him such an array of heterogeneous proofs, all radiating to one centre, as no recorded trial ever elicited before. Now, the naturalists have laid down a maxim of reasoning in such cases which every lawyer in England would do well to copy into his notebook:—"The true solution is that which reconciles all the indisputable facts." Apply this test to the theories that the Claimant is Castro, is Doolan, is Morgan; those theories all dissolve before that immortal piece of wisdom like hailstones before the midsummer sun. In the same way—to use a favourite form in Euclid—it can be proved that no other person except Arthur Orton is the Tichborne Claimant. Is this uncertainty? What, then, of all we believe—either human or divine—is certain?—

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

THE DOCTRINE OF COINCIDENCES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "FACT."

FIRST LETTER.

SIR,—In reply to your query—it is true that after the trial at Nisi Prius, where "the Claimant" was Plaintiff, but before his trial at Bar as Defendant, I pronounced him to be Arthur Orton, and gave my reasons.

These you now invite me to repeat. I will do so ; only let me premise that I am not so vain as to think I can say anything essentially new on this subject, which has been fully discussed by men superior to me in attainments.

It so happens, however, that those superior men have always veiled a part of their own mental process, though it led them to a just conclusion : they have never stated in direct terms their major premiss, or leading principle. This is a common omission, especially amongst Anglo-Saxon reasoners ; but it is a positive defect, and one I do think I can supply. But before we come to the debateable matter, I fear I must waste a few words on the impossible—namely, that this man is Roger Charles Tichborne.

Well, then, let those, who have not studied the evidence and cross-examination, just cast their eyes on this paper and see a sample of what they must believe, or else reject that chimera.

That Roger Tichborne was drowned with thirty more, yet reappeared years after, all alone, leaving at the bottom of the sea all his companions, and certain miscellaneous articles, viz. :—

1. His affection for his mother, his brother, and others.
2. His handwriting.

3. His leanness.

4. His French.

5. His love of writing letters to his folk.

6. His knowledge of Chateaubriand, and his comprehension of what the deuce he, Roger Tichborne, was writing about when he put upon paper—before his submersion—that he admired René, and gave his reasons.

7. His knowledge of the Tichborne estates, and the counties they lay in.

8. His knowledge of his mother's Christian names.

9. His knowledge of his beloved sweetheart's face, figure, and voice.

10. His tattoo marks, three inches long.

11. His religion.

12. Five years of his life. These five years lay full fathom five at the bottom of the ocean hard by No. 10, when this aristocratic Papist married a servant girl in a Baptist chapel, and was only thirty years old, as appears on the register in his handwriting, which is nothing like Tichborne's. Along with this rubbish we may as well sweep away the last invention of weak and wavering intellects, that the Claimant is no individual in particular, but a sort of solidified myth, incarnate alias, or obese hallucination.

And now having applied our besoms to the bosh, let us apply our minds to the debateable. Since he is not dead Castro, nor dead Tichborne, nor live Alias, who is he? Here then to those, who go with me so far, I proceed to state the leading principle, which governs the case thus narrowed, and—always implied, though unfortunately never stated—led our courts to a reasonable conclusion. That principle is:

THE PROGRESSIVE VALUE OF PROVED COINCIDENCES ALL POINTING TO ONE CONCLUSION.

Pray take notice that by proved coincidences I mean coincidences that are—

1.—Not merely seeming, but independent and real.

2.—Either undisputed, or indisputable.

3.—Either extracted from a hostile witness, which is the highest kind of evidence, especially where the witness is a deliberate liar; or

4.—Directly sworn to by respectable witnesses in open court, and then cross-examined and not shaken—which is the next best evidence to the involuntary admissions of a liar interested in concealing the truth.

Men born to be deceived like children may think these precautions extravagant: but they are neither excessive nor new: they are sober, true, and just to both the parties in every mortal cause; they have been for ages the safeguard of all great and wary minds; and neither I nor any other man can lay down any general position of reasoning, that will guide men aright, who are so arrogant, so ignorant, or so weak, as to scorn them.

On the other hand, if your readers will accept these safeguards, the general principle I have laid down will never deceive them; it will show them who the Claimant is, and it will aid them in far greater difficulties, and more important enquiries; for, like all sound principles of reason, it is equally applicable to questions of science, literature, history, or crime.

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

SECOND LETTER.

SIR,—A single indisputable coincidence raises a presumption, that often points towards the truth.

A priori what is more unlikely than that the moon, a mere satellite, and a very small body, should so attract the giant earth as to cause our tides? Indeed, for years science rejected the theory; but certain changes of the tide coinciding regularly with changes of the moon wore out prejudice, and have established the truth. Yet these coincident changes, though repeated ad infinitum, make but one logical coincidence.

On the other hand, it must be owned that a single coincidence often deceives. To take a sublunary and appropriate example, the real Martin Guerre had a wart on his cheek; so had the sham Martin Guerre. The coincidence was genuine and remarkable: yet the men were distinct. But mark the ascending ratio—see the influence on the mind of a double coincidence—when the impostor with the real wart told the sisters of Martin Guerre some particulars of their family history, and reminded Martin's wife of something he had said to her on their bridal night, in the solitude of the nuptial chamber, this seeming knowledge, coupled with that real wart, struck her mind with the force of a double coincidence; and no more was needed to make her accept the impostor, and cohabit with him for years.

Does not this enforce what I urged in my first letter as to the severe caution necessary in receiving alleged, or seeming, or manipulated coincidences, as if they were proved and real ones? However, I use the above incident at present mainly to show the ascending power on the mind of coincidences when received as genuine.

I will now show their ascending value when proved in open court and tested by cross-examination.

A. was found dead of a gunshot wound, and the singed paper that had been used for wadding lay near him. It was a fragment of the Times. B.'s house was searched, and they found there a gun recently discharged, and the copy of the Times, from which the singed paper aforesaid had been torn; the pieces fitted exactly.

The same thing happened in France with a slight variation; the paper used for wadding was part of an old breviary, subsequently found in B.'s house.

The salient facts of each case made a treble coincidence. What was the result? The treble coincidence sworn, cross-examined, and unshaken, hanged the Englishman, and guillotined the Frenchman. In neither case was there a scintilla of direct evidence; in neither case was the verdict impugned.

I speak within bounds when I say that a genuine double coincidence, proved beyond doubt, is not twice, but two hundred times, as strong, as one such coincidence, and that a genuine treble coincidence is many thousand times as strong as one such coincidence. But, when we get to a five-fold coincidence real and proved, it is a million to one against all these honest circumstances having combined to deceive us.

As for a seven-fold coincidence not manipulated, nor merely alleged, but fully proved, does either history, science, literature, or crime offer one example of its ever misleading the human mind? Why, the very existence of seven independent and indisputable coincidences, all pointing to one conclusion, is a rarity so great, that, in all my reading, I hardly know where to find an example of it except in the defence that baffled this claimant at Nisi Prius.

Now, on that occasion, the parties encountered each other plump on various lines of evidence. There were direct recognitions of his personal identity by respectable witnesses, and direct disavowals of the same by respectable witnesses, just as there were in the case of the sham Martin Guerre, who brought thirty honest disinterested witnesses to swear he was the man he turned out not to be.

With this part of the case I will not meddle here, though I have plenty to say upon it.

But both parties also multiplied coincidences: only some of these were real, some apparent, some manipulated, some honest and independent, some said or sworn out of court by liars, who knew better than venture into the witness-box with them; some proved by cross-examination, or in spite of it. We have only to subject this hodge-podge of real and sham to the approved test laid down in my first letter, and we shall see daylight; for the Claimant's is a clear case, made obscure by verbosity, and conjecture in the teeth of proof!

A. He proved in court a genuine coincidence of a corporeal kind—viz., that Roger Tichborne was in-kneed, with the left leg turned out more than the right, and the Claimant was in-kneed in a similar way.

This is a remarkable coincidence, and cross-examination failed to shake it.

But when he attempted to prove a second coincidence of corporeal peculiarities like the above, which, being the work of nature, cannot be combated, what a falling off in the evidence.

B. They found in the Claimant a congenital brown mark on the side; but they could only assert or imagine a similar mark in Tichborne. No vivâ voce evidence by eye-witnesses to anything of the sort.

C. They proved, by Dr. Wilson, a peculiar formation in the Claimant: but instead of proving by some doctor, surgeon, or eye-witness a similar formation in Tichborne, they went off into wild inferences. The eccentric woman, who kept her boy three years under a seton, had also kept him a long time in frocks; and the same boy, when a moody young man, had written despondent phrases, such as, in all other cases, imply a dejected mind, but here are to be perverted to indicate a malformed body, although many doctors, surgeons, and nurses, knew Tichborne's body, and not one of all these ever saw this malformation which, in the nude body, must have been visible fifty yards off. In short, the coincidences B and C, were proved incidences with unproved "Co's."

Failing to establish a double coincidence of congenital features or marks, the Claimant went off into artificial skin marks.

Examples: Roger had marks of a seton; the Claimant showed marks of a similar kind.

Roger had a cut at the back of his head, and another on his wrist. So had the Claimant.

Roger had the seams of a lancet on his ankles. The Claimant came provided with punctures on the ankle.

Roger winked and blinked. So did the Claimant.

Then there was something about a mark on the eyelid: but on this head I forget whether the Claimant's witness ever faced cross-examination. Nor does it very much matter, for all these artificial coincidences are rotten at the core: unlike the one true corporeal coincidence the Claimant proved, they could all be imitated; and, as regards the ankles, imitation was reasonably suspected in court, for the Claimant's needle-pricks were unlike the seam of a lancet, and were not applied to the ankle-pulse, as they would have been, by a surgeon, on lean Tichborne, in whom the saphena vein would be manifest, and even the ankle-pulse perceptible, though not in a fair, fat, and false representative. Then the seton marks were stiffly disputed, and the balance of medical testimony was that the Claimant's marks were not of that precise character.

These doubtful coincidences were also encountered by direct dissidences on the same line of observation. Roger was bled in the temporal artery, and the Claimant showed no puncture there. Roger was tattooed with a crown, cross and anchor by a living witness, who faced cross-examination, and several witnesses in the cause saw the tattoo marks at various times; and it was no answer to all this positive evidence to bring witnesses who did not tattoo him, and other witnesses who never saw the tattoo marks. The pickpocket, who brought twenty witnesses that did not see him pick a certain pocket, against two who did, was defeated by the intrinsic nature of evidence. I shall ask no person to receive any coincidence from me that was so shaken and made doubtful, and also neutralized by dissidences, as the imitable skin marks in this case were. But the Claimant also opened a large vein of apparent coincidences in the knowledge shown by him at certain times and places of numerous men and things known to Roger Tichborne. These were very remarkable. He knew private matters known to Tichborne and A, to Tichborne and B, to Tichborne and C, etc., and he knew more about Tichborne than either A, B, C, etc., individually knew. It is not fair nor reasonable to pooh-pooh this. But the defendants met this fairly; they said these coincidences were not arrived at by his being Tichborne, but by his pumping various individuals who knew Tichborne: and they applied fair and sagacious tests to the matter.

They urged as a general truth that Tichborne in Australia would have known just as much about himself, his relations, and his affairs as he subsequently knew in England. And I must do them the justice to say this position is impregnable. Then they went into detail and proved that when Gibbs first spotted the Claimant at Wagga-Wagga, he was as ignorant as dirt of Tichborne matters; did not know the Christian names of Tichborne's mother, nor the names of the Tichborne estates, nor the counties where they lay. They then showed the steps by which his ignorance might have been partly lessened and much knowledge picked up, they showed a lady, who longed to be deceived, and all but said so, putting him by letter on to Bogle—Bogle startled, and pumped—the Claimant showing the upper part of his face in Paris to the lady who wanted to be deceived, and, after recognition on those terms, pumping her largely; then coming to England with a large stock of fact thus obtained, and in England pumping Carter, Bulpitt, and others, searching Lloyd's, etc.

2. Having proved the gradual growth of knowledge in the Claimant between Wagga-Wagga and the Court of Common Pleas, they took him in court with all his acquired knowledge, and cross-examined him on a vast number of things well-known to Tichborne. Under this test, for which his preparations were necessarily imperfect, he betrayed a mass of ignorance on a multitude of things familiar to Roger Tichborne, and he betrayed it not frankly as honest men betray ignorance, or oblivion of what they have once really known, but in spite of such fencing, evading, shuffling, and equivocating, as the most experienced have rarely seen in the witness-box. Personating a gentleman he shuffled without a blush; personating a collegian, he did not know what a quadrangle is. The inscription over the Stonyhurst quadrangle, "Laus Deo," was strange to him. He thought it meant something about the laws of God. He knew no French, no Latin. He thought Cæsar was a Greek: and, when a crucial test was offered him, which, if he had been Tichborne, he would have welcomed with delight, and turned the scale in his favour, when a thoughtful comment by Roger Tichborne on the character of René was submitted to him, and he was questioned about this René, he was utterly flabbergasted. He wriggled, and writhed, and brazened out his ignorance, but it shone forth in spite of him. He was evidently not the man, who had tasted Châteaubriand, and written a thoughtful comment on René. His mind was not that mind, any more than his hand-writing was that hand-writing.

To judge this whole vein of coincidences, and their neutralising dissidences, the jury had now before them three streams of fact.

1. That at Wagga-Wagga the Claimant knew nothing about Tichborne more than the advertisements told him.

2. That in England he knew an incredible number of things about Tichborne.

3. That in England he took Mrs. Towneley for Roger's sweetheart, and, even at the trial, was ignorant of many things Tichborne could not be ignorant of.

NOW, IN ALL CASES, WHERE THERE ARE SEVERAL FACTS INDISPUTABLE, YET SEEMINGLY OPPOSED, SCIENCE DECLARES THE TRUE SOLUTION TO BE THAT, WHICH, SETTING ASIDE THE DOUBTFUL FACTS, RECONCILES ALL THE INDISPUTABLE FACTS.

This maxim is infallible :

The good sense of the jury led them to this solution as surely as science would have led a jury of Huxleys and Tindals to it; and they decided that the coincidences were remarkable, but manipulated, the knowledge astonishing, but acquired, the ignorance an inevitable residue, which only Tichborne could have escaped. They saw a small pump working in Australia, a large pump working in Paris, a huge pump working in England, but a human, and therefore finite, pump after all, as proved in court by examination of the Radcliffes, Gosford, and others; and, above all, by cross-examination of the Claimant, which last is the highest evidence.

So much for the single genuine coincidence of the knees, and the manipulated coincidences of artificial skin-marks, and acquired knowledge, relied on for the Claimant.

At this stage your readers should ask themselves two questions—

1st. Is not history printed experience; and ought experience to be printed in vain?

Did not the real wart, and the simulated knowledge, and the thirty direct witnesses of the sham Martin Guerre, anticipate the broad outline of this Claimant's case?

2nd. As regards the coincidences, which were not only open to the charge of manipulation, but also neutralised by dissidences, are they mighty enough to convince any candid mind that a fat, live person—who slaughtered bullocks and married a housemaid, and swore in the box without a blush that he had lied, like a low fellow, to his friend and benefactor, Gibbs, and that he well knew, and had loved, and after the manner of the lower orders seduced a lady (though he afterwards took Mrs. Towneley for her), and still following the lower orders, blasted her reputation—was the lean, dead aristocrat, Tichborne, who went down in the Bella, with all hands, not one of whom has reappeared, and died, as he had lived, the delicate, loyal lover of the chaste Kate Doughty—and a gentleman—and a man of honour?

I will now show, in contrast, the indisputable coincidences, which, converging from different quarters, all point to one conclusion—that the Claimant is Arthur Orton, of Wapping.

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

THIRD LETTER.

SIR,—I now venture to hope that all I have written will seem silly to fanatics, and that unprejudiced minds will grant me—

1. That, where there are indisputable facts and doubtful ones, the true solution is that, which ignores the doubtful, and reconciles all the indisputable, facts.

2. That two coincidences, are a hundred times as strong as one, and five coincidences a million times as strong as one; and so on in a gigantic ratio as the coincidences multiply.

3. That coincidences, like other circumstances, must rest on legal evidence, and that there is a scale of legal evidence,

Her Majesty's jails! See scale of evidence B. These two great instruments of evidence, men and circumstances, resemble each other in this, that men do not lie without a motive, and circumstances never have a motive, and therefore never lie, though man may misinterpret them. And it is the beauty of true coincidences that in them circumstance preponderates, and man plays second fiddle. A coincidence often surprises even deceitful men into revealing the truth: for a coincidence is two facts pointing to one conclusion; and the effect of the first fact is seldom seen till the second comes, and then it is too late to tamper effectually with the pair.

You will see this pure and unforeseeing character running through most of the coincidences I now lay before you.

1. It was proved that Tichborne was in-kneed, and dead, and that the Claimant and Arthur Orton are in-kneed and alive.

2. Disinterested witnesses swore that Arthur Orton was unusually stout at twenty, and was called at Wapping, "bullocky" Orton. Later in his life, Australian witnesses, who knew him, described him as uncommonly lusty. The Claimant's figure is described in similar terms by all the Australian witnesses who knew him. Now, many a lean youth puts on fat between thirty-five and forty, but lean, active men do not very often fatten from twenty to thirty. This, therefore, is a coincidence, though a feeble one.

3. Arthur Orton, born September 13th, 1832, was the youngest son of George Orton, a shipping butcher, and an importer of Shetland ponies. He used to ride the ponies from the Dundee steamers, and so got a horseman's seat; for they are awkward animals to ride, if you take them like that, one after another, raw from the Shetland Isles. When full grown, but under age, he slaughtered and dressed sheep and bullocks for his father.

The Claimant in Australia lived by riding, and slaughtering, and dressing beasts. On this point, his own evidence agrees with that of every witness who knew him. And when he came up the Thames in the Cella to personate Tichborne, he asked the pilot what had become of Ferguson, the man who used to be pilot of the Dundee boats. All this taken together is rather a strong coincidence. It may seem weak; but apply a test. To whom does all this, as a whole apply? The riding,—the slaughtering,—and the spontaneous interest in an old Dundee pilot? To Castro? To Tichborne? To any known man not an Orton?

4. In 1848, Arthur Orton, aged 16, sailed to Valparaiso, and subsequently in June, 1849, made his way to Melipilla. He was young, fair, the only English boy in the place, and the good people took to him. He made friends with Dona Hayley, wife of an English doctor, and with Thomas Castro and his wife, and many others. They were very kind to him in 1849, and '50, particularly Dona Hayley, and in these gentle minds the kindly feeling survived the lapse of time, and his long neglect of them. Not foreseeing in 1850 his little game in 1866, Arthur Orton told Dona Hayley he was the son of Orton, the Queen's butcher, and as a child had played with the Queen's children. Not being a prophet, all this bounce at that date went to aggrandise Orton. He spoke of Arthur's sisters, by name, and Dona Hayley, twenty years after, remembered the names with slight and natural variations. The wife of Thomas Castro was called at Melipilla Dona Natalia Sarmiento; but this English boy, knowing her to be the wife of Castro, used to call her Mrs. Castro.

This seems to have amused Dona Hayley, and she noted it. This boy was not Castro, for Castro was an elderly Spaniard, kind to this boy on the spot, and at the time. He was not Tichborne, for Tichborne was in England till late in 1852. Tichborne's alibi during Arthur Orton's whole visit to Melipilla is proved by a cloud of witnesses, and his own writing, and is indeed, admitted; he sailed late in 1852, and reached Chili in 1853. Arthur Orton was back in England, June 1851.

Now so much of this as respects Arthur Orton is the first branch of a pure, unforeseen coincidence. The second branch is this—The Claimant on the 28th August, 1867, wrote from his solicitor's office, 25, Poultry, to prepare the good Melipillians for a new theory—that Arthur Orton, seventeen years old to the naked eye was not Castro,—(that cock might fight in Hobart Town, but not in Melipilla); not Castro, but Tichborne, age 23. He wrote to Thomas Castro, complained he was kept out of his estates, and begged to be kindly remembered to Don Juan Hayley, to Clara and Jesusa, to Don Ramon Alcade, Dona Hurtado, to Senorita Matilda, Jose Maria Bereguet, and his brother, and others, in short to twelve persons besides Castro himself. One of the messages has per se the character of a coincidence. "My respects to Donna Natalia Sarmiento, or, as I used to call her, Mr. Castro."

Thomas Castro, to whom this was sent, being in confinement as a lunatic, his son Pedro Castro, replied in a letter full of kindness, simple faith, and a desire to serve his injured friend. His letter carries God's truth stamped on it. His replies to the kind messages accord with our sad experience of time and its ravages. "His father bereft of reason, his mother—dead this fourteen months. Dona Hayley's recollection of the boy perfect, and she is ready to serve him, and depose to the truth. But the doctor's memory gone through intemperance, Dona Jesus dead." "Don Jose Maria Berenguel is not so called, his name is Don Francesco Berenguel. He is established at Valparaiso." Then the writer goes on to say what had become of the other friends enquired after by the Claimant. One of them he specifies in particular as taking fire at the Claimant's letter, and remembering all about him, and desirous to serve him, he himself being animated by the same spirit, tells him that Dona Francesca Ahumada retains a lock of his hair, which he suggests the Claimant might turn to account: and so he might if he had been Tichborne. In the same spirit he warns him that his enemies had an agent at Melipilla hunting up data to use against him.

The correspondence thus begun continued in the same spirit.

The whole coincidence is this: The Claimant stayed a long time at Melipilla in 1849 and 1850, and called himself Arthur Orton, and proved himself Arthur Orton, by giving full details of his family, and left Chili in 1850, during all which time an alibi is proved for Tichborne, but none can be proved nor has ever been attempted, for Arthur Orton. On the contrary, a non alibi was directly proved for him. He was traced from Wapping to Valparaiso, and Melipilla, in 1848. His stay there till 1850 was proved, and then he was traced in 1850 into the Jessie Miller, and home to Wapping in 1851 just as he had been traced out—by ships' registers and a cloud of witnesses.

The coincidence rests on the two highest kinds of evidence, the Claimant's written admission, and the direct evidence of respectable witnesses unshaken by cross-examination (see scale of evidence), and it points to the Claimant as Arthur Orton.

Those who can see he is not Tichborne, but are deceived by the falsehoods of men into believing he is not Orton, should give special study to this coincidence; for here the Claimant is either Tichborne or Orton. No third alternative is possible. At Melipilla, in 1850, he was either Orton, who was there, aged 17, or Tichborne, who was in England, aged 23.

5. There was, for some years, a bulky man in Australia riding and breaking horses, slaughtering and dressing beasts. His name—Castro—appears when that of Orton disappears. The two men seem to differ in name but not in figure and occupation. And no witness ever came into the witness-box and swore that he had ever seen these two portly butchers in two different skins. In 1867 the Claimant explained this phenomenon.

In his letter to Thomas Castro he wrote thus:—"And another strange thing I have to tell you, and I have no doubt you will say I took a great liberty on myself, that is to say, I took and made use of your name, and was only known in Australia by the name of Thomas Castro. I said also I belonged to Chili." He adds, however, an assurance that he had never disgraced him as a horseman. This coincidence proves that whenever we meet in Australia a bulky butcher, stock-keeper, horse-breaker, &c., called Thomas Castro, of Chili, that means the Claimant, and also means Arthur Orton, of Melipilla.

And Arthur Orton of Melipilla, is Arthur Orton of Wapping.

6. This sham Castro, sham Chilian, sham aristocrat, &c., married, as people do nine times in ten, into his own class, a servant girl who could not write her name. She made her mark. He forged a friend's name. Apparently he did not foresee he was going to leave off shamming Castro and begin shamming Tichborne, a stiff Papist; so he got married by a dissenting minister, and in signing the register, described himself as thirty years old.

Castro was, say sixty; Tichborne was thirty-six. Who was thirty?

Arthur Orton of Wapping.

7. It was the interest of Gibbes this man should be Tichborne. His wishes influenced his judgment. He inclined to think he was the right man. But some things staggered him; in particular the man's want of education. Gibbes told him frankly that seemed inconsistent. Then the Claimant, to get over that, told Gibbes that in childhood he had a nervous affection which checked his education. He then described this affection so correctly that Gibbes said, "Bless me, that is St. Vitus's dance." "Yes," said the Claimant, "that is what they used to call it."

This solution eased Gibbes' mind, and he sat down and, honestly enough, sent an account of the conversation to Lady Tichborne's agent; he wrote it to serve the plaintiff, not foreseeing the turn that revelation of the truth would take.

Coming home in the Rachia there was some document or other to be read out, and the passengers confided this to the Claimant as a person claiming the highest rank. He blundered and made a mess of it, and showed his ignorance so that suspicion was raised, and one Mr. Hodson put it point blank to him—"You a baronet, and can't read!" Then the Claimant told him he had been afflicted in his boyhood with St. Vitus's dance, and could not learn his letters.

It was afterwards proved by a surgeon and a multitude of witnesses that at ten years of age Arthur Orton had been frightened by a fire, and afflicted with St. Vitus's dance, and that this had really checked his education, and that the traces of it had remained by him for years; and that, in fact, he was sent to sea in hopes of a cure. This coincidence is very strong. Observe—it is not confined to the disease; but to the time of life, and its effect on a boy's education.

No doubt a third man neither Tichborne nor Orton might have St. Vitus's dance as a little boy, and so be made a dunce, in spite of great natural ability. There is not above a hundred thousand to one against it; but coming after coincidences 4, 5, and 6, which clear away Castro and all other mere vapours, and confine the question to Tichborne or Orton, have I not now the right to say, Tichborne, by admission of all the witnesses on both sides, never had St. Vitus's dance; Arthur Orton undisputably had St. Vitus's dance; the Claimant to account for his ignorance, spontaneously declared at different times, and to different people that he had been afflicted with St. Vitus's dance, and this coincidence points to the Claimant as Arthur Orton of Wapping?

Yours obediently,

CHARLES READE.

FOURTH LETTER.

SIR,—I will ask those who have done me the honour to keep my last letter, to draw a circle on a sheet of paper, the larger the better, and to draw seven radii from its centre across the line of circumference to the edge of the paper; then upon those extended radii, and between the circle and the edge of the paper, I will ask them to write in small letters a short epitome of each coincidence, or a few words recalling what they consider its salient feature.

Those who will do me the honour to take the trouble, and so become my fellow-labourers in logic, will not repent it. It will, I think, assist them, as it has assisted me, to realize how vast an area both of territory and of multifarious evidence is covered at the circumference by these seven coincidences, which nevertheless converge to one central point, no bigger than a pin's head, viz., that this Claimant, who has owned himself a sham Castro of Chili, but clings to his other alias, Tichborne, is Arthur Orton of Wapping.

8. From the day the Bella foundered to the day Gibbes spotted the Claimant, a period of thirteen or fourteen years, Roger Tichborne never wrote a line to his mother or his brother, or any relation or friend. This is accounted for rationally and charitably by his being dead at the bottom of the ocean.

No, says the Claimant, I was alive all the time, and let my mother and my brother and my sweetheart think I had died horribly, cut off in my prime.

The animal never realized that he was both drawing upon human credulity, and describing a monster and a beast. What was it that so blinded his most powerful understanding? From 1852 to 1865 Arthur Orton never wrote a line to Wapping. He let the father who reared him, the mother who bore him, go to their graves without one little word to say their son was alive. Not a line to brother, sister, or sweetheart. This unnatural trait being absent in Tichborne till he was drowned, and present in the Claimant by his own confession, and in Arthur Orton by a pyramid of evidence, is a startling coincidence of a new class. The unnatural heart of the Claimant is the unnatural heart of Arthur Orton.

9. In 1852 Arthur Orton went out to Hobart Town with two Shetland ponies in the Middleton.

Subsequently, as the Claimant swore, he was for years at Boisdale and Dargo, slaughtering and riding, &c., in the service of Mr. W. Foster, and under the name of Castro, the Chilian. Foster's widow confirmed most of this, and produced her account books for 1854, 55, 56, 57, and 58, with full details of the Claimant's service during a part of that time; but she knew him as Arthur Orton, and he figured as Arthur Orton all through the books, and the name of Castro did not occur in any of these books. The books were dry account books written in Australia, with a short-sighted view to the things of the place and the time, and not in prophetic anticipation of a London trial, that lay hid in the womb of time.

Not to multiply coincidences unfairly, I am content to throw in here, that on a page of a book produced by this Australian witness, was written as follows:—

DARGO, 11th March, 1858.

“I, Arthur Orton, &c.,” vowing vengeance in good set terms, on some persons who had wronged him.

The witness had no doubt this was written by her servant, the Claimant, whom, by the by, she recognised in court as her Arthur Orton; and two judges compared the handwriting with the Claimant's, and declared positively they were identical. Now, the judges try so many questions of handwriting, and examine so many skilled witnesses, that they become great experts in all matters of this kind; and as they are judges who—unlike other European judges—can and do disagree, I think their consent on this matter, though not sworn evidence, is very convincing to any candid mind. However, I have no wish to press this part of the coincidence separately, or unduly; but I do say that, taken altogether, No. 9 is a most weighty coincidence.

10. A pocket-book was produced at the trial with miscellaneous entries by the Claimant, artfully inserted to identify him with Tichborne. That being the object, it is unfortunate that he wrote down as follows:—La Bella, R. C. Tichborne arrived at Hobart Town, July 4, 1854. Becarse at the trial he said he landed at Melbourne.

The person who landed at Hobart Town was Arthur Orton in the Middleton. In this same book he wrote—Rodger Charles Tichborne, and Miss Mary Anne Loader, 7, Russell's Buildings, High Street, Wapping. Now, here are three things Roger Tichborne was ignorant of:

1. That his name was Rodger.
2. That Mary Anne Loader existed.
3. That she lived at 7, Russell's Buildings, High Street, Wapping.

Now, who on earth was this, that landed, not at Melbourne, but Hobart Town, and knew so little about Roger Tichborne, and so much about Mary Anne Loader?

Who could it be but Mary Anne Loader's quondam sweetheart, whose letters, written in the Claimant's handwriting, and signed Arthur Orton, she brought into Court, and identified the man himself as her own sweetheart, Arthur Orton?

That identification would be valueless by itself, in this special line of argument, but the entry in the pocket-book by the Claimant's own hand makes it a coincidence.

11. At Wagga Wagga the Claimant, being called upon to play the part of Tichborne, made a will, and appointed executors, to wit "John Jarvis, Esq., of Bridport, Dorsetshire, and my mother, Lady Hannah Frances Tichborne." Failing either of them, he appointed Sir John Bird, of Hertfordshire. As guardian of his children, he appointed his friend Gibbes; and failing him, Mr. Henry Angell. Now when all this was looked into by the other side, the Claimant's aristocratic friend, Sir John Bird, was found to be a myth. That aristocrat existed, like the Claimant's own pretensions to aristocracy, in the Claimant's imagination; but the plebeians were real men: friends of Tichborne? Of course not. Jarvis and Angell were old friends of Arthur Orton. When this was discovered, the Claimant pretended these plebeian executors were suggested to him by Arthur Orton; but Arthur Orton was not on the spot, except in the skin of the Claimant; out of that skin neither Gibbes nor any witness saw him at Wagga Wagga when that will was drawn. At the trial Angell recognised the Claimant as his old acquaintance, Arthur Orton, and that evidence confirms a coincidence which was already very striking.

12. The Claimant came home, asked after Fergusor, Arthur Orton's old friend, as he steamed up the river, and at last got to Ford's Hotel with his wife.

It was Christmas Day, a cold evening, and he was in the bosom of his family, which people do not leave for strangers on Christmas night. What does he do? Gets up, leaves his family and the Christmas fire, and goes off all alone in a four-wheel?

Where to?

To Tichborne?

To some place where the Tichborne family could be heard of?

No; to Wapping.

He gets to the Globe, Wapping, finds Mrs. Johnson, who keeps the house, and her mother who had once kept it.

The Claimant walks in, orders a glass, and talks about the Ortons and their neighbours, showing so much more knowledge than any stranger in the neighbourhood could have possessed, that Mrs. Fairhead looked at him more keenly, saw a likeness to old George Orton, and said, "Why, you must be an Orton."

Such is the attraction of Wapping that he goes down there again next day and sees a Mrs. Pardon, who also observes his likeness to the Ortons. He passes himself off not as Tichborne, who never could be a friend of Orton's, but as a Mr. Stephens, who might, if he existed, except as an alias.

He does not attempt the Tichborne lie at Wapping, any more than the Castro lie at Melipilla.

The portrait of his own wife and child, which he gave as a portrait of Arthur Orton's wife and child, and the other curious details are pretty well known, and I have no wish to go too far into debatable matter. Take the indisputable part only of this twelfth coincidence and read it with its eleven predecessors.

13. There were remarkable coincidences between the spelling and the handwriting of the Claimant and Arthur Orton. This is a part of the subject I cannot properly do justice to. I can only select from the mass of evidence the Chief Justice submitted to the jury. The Claimant writes the word receive, so does Arthur Orton; also anythink and nothink for anything and nothing, a mistake peculiar to the lower orders. They also spell Elizabeth Elisaberth. "Few" they spell fue; "whether" "weather." The pronoun I they both write i, after the manner of the lower orders. But as this is not merely a coincidence but a vein of coincidences which it would take columns to explain, I prefer to refer the candid reader to the masterly dissection of handwriting that took place at the last trial, and the Chief Justice's most careful analysis of it.

14. At the first trial there were heavy sums at stake, and a wide belief in the Claimant, and a romantic interest in him.

The Claimant's friends would have given hundreds of pounds to any seaman, who would come into the box and prove he sailed in the Bella, on her last trip. We all know Jack tar; give him his month's pay, and he is as ready to sail to the port of London as to any other, and readier to sail to London for £300 and his month's pay than to any other port for his month's pay alone. Yet not one of these poor fellows could be got alive to London, for the first trial. Why not? Creation was raked for witnesses, and with remarkable success. Why could not one of these seamen be raked for love or money into the witness-box of the Common-Pleas? Was it because money will not draw men from the bottom of the sea, or was it because the trial was in London, and a large sum of money awaited them there for expenses? Who does not see, that, had the trial been at Melbourne, these fabulous seamen would have been heard of, not at Melbourne, but in London or some other port ten thousand miles off, where they could have been talked about in far away Melbourne, but never shown to a Melbourne jury.

Well, the real inability, and pretended unwillingness, of those poor seamen to come to London and get two or three hundred pounds apiece, is matched by the real inability, and fictitious unwillingness, of Arthur Orton, to show his face in London except in the skin of the Claimant. The two non-appearances make one coincidence.

The Claimant, who knows better than any other man, declared Arthur Orton to be alive in 1866; and in Australia; and from that time a hundred thousand eyes have been looking for him in the Colony, yet nobody can find him there alive, or get legal evidence of so marked a man's decease.

At the first trial seven or eight thousand pounds were waiting for him, just to show his person in the witness-box in any man's skin but the Claimant's.

Yet he held aloof, and by his absence killed the Claimant's case at Nisi Prius.

At the criminal trial there were still a thousand pounds or two waiting for this needy butcher.

My subject proper ends here ; but with your permission I will add a short letter correcting the false impression conveyed to the judges by defendant's counsel, that the famous Irish case of James Annesley was a precedent favourable to the Claimant. I will also ask leave to comment upon the question whether the extreme term of imprisonment under the Act ought to be inflicted, and also that term repeated ; for false oaths sworn by the same individual in the course of a single litigation.

I am,

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

SUPPLEMENTAL LETTER.

SIR,—The ordinary features of a trial are repeated ad infinitum ; but now and then, say once in a hundred remarkable trials, comes an intellectual phenomenon—

There is at the disposal of the Plaintiff's counsel, or the Defendant's, a friendly witness, whose evidence to some vital point ought to carry far more weight, if believed, than any other person's evidence : yet that friendly witness is not called. Let a vital point of the case be matter of direct and absolute knowledge to A, but only matter of strong belief or conviction to B, C, and D, A is then, as regards that vital matter, the principal witness, and all B, C, and D, can do is to corroborate in a small degree the higher evidence of A. Then, if A is not called, this suppression casts utter discredit upon the inferior witnesses, who are called, and upon the whole case.

The reason is obvious to all persons acquainted with litigation.

Verdicts are obtained, and, above all, held, by the evidence alone. Witnesses are not allowed to go into the box without consent of counsel. Counsel are consulted behind the scenes as to what witnesses are necessary to the case, and may be safely shown to the jury, and trusted to the ordeal of cross-examination. If then an able counsel withholds his principal witness from the jury, he throws dirt upon his own case ; but

After several interviews with Gibbes and some correspondence with Lady Tichborne, but whilst his knowledge of Tichborne affairs was still very confined, it was thought advisable by his friends that the Claimant should make a statutory declaration. He made one accordingly in the character of Roger Tichborne, and by this time he had learned the date of Roger's birth, and landed him at Melbourne, June 24th, 1854. But, being still ignorant when Roger sailed on his last voyage, viz., 1st March, 1853, and in La Pauline, he declared as follows:—

"I left England in the Jessie Miller, 28th November, 1852." Now, in point of fact, Arthur Orton sailed—while Tichborne was at Upton—in the Middleton; but he sailed 28th November, 1852, which is a coincidence; and the Jessie Miller is a ship unknown to Roger Tichborne, but well known to Arthur Orton, for he sailed in her from Valparaiso in 1851.

Subsequently, having declared he was picked up at sea by the Osprey, and carried into Melbourne, he was asked for the name of his principal benefactor, the captain, and of the other kind souls who had saved him, fed him, etc., for three months, and earned his eternal gratitude; all he could recall was Lewis Owen, or Owen Lewis. Now Arthur Orton's ship, the Middleton, contained two persons, one Lewis and one Owen. So here we find him dragging into his "voyages imaginaires" of Tichborne, true particulars of two voyages by Arthur Orton.

Your readers, especially those who have paid me the compliment of drawing the circle with radii converging to one centre, can now fill the interstices of those radii, and so possess a map of the fifteen heterogeneous, and independent, coincidences converging from different quarters of the globe, and different cities, towns, and streets, and also from different departments of fact, material, moral, and psychological, towards one central point, that this man is Arthur Orton. Then, if you like, apply the exhaustive method, of which Euclid is fond in his earlier propositions. Fit the fifteen coincidences on to Roger Tichborne if you can. If this is too impossible, try them on Castro the Chilian, or Stevens, the man who dropped down on Wapping from the sky.

You will conclude with Euclid, "in the same way it can be proved that no other person except Arthur Orton is the true centre of this circle of coincidences."

My subject proper ends here ; but with your permission I will add a short letter correcting the false impression conveyed to the judges by defendant's counsel, that the famous Irish case of James Annesley was a precedent favourable to the Claimant. I will also ask leave to comment upon the question whether the extreme term of imprisonment under the Act ought to be inflicted, and also that term repeated ; for false oaths sworn by the same individual in the course of a single litigation.

SUPPLEMENTAL LETTER.

SIR,—The ordinary features of a trial are repeated ad infinitum ; but now and then, say once in a hundred remarkable trials, comes an intellectual phenomenon—

There is at the disposal of the Plaintiff's counsel, or the Defendant's, a friendly witness, whose evidence to some vital point ought to carry far more weight, if believed, than any other person's evidence : yet that friendly witness is not called. Let a vital point of the case be matter of direct and absolute knowledge to A, but only matter of strong belief or conviction to B, C, and D, A is then, as regards that vital matter, the principal witness, and all B, C, and D, can do is to corroborate in a small degree the higher evidence of A. Then, if A is not called, this suppression casts utter discredit upon the inferior witnesses, who are called, and upon the whole case.

The reason is obvious to all persons acquainted with litigation.

Verdicts are obtained, and, above all, held, by the evidence alone. Witnesses are not allowed to go into the box without consent of counsel. Counsel are consulted behind the scenes as to what witnesses are necessary to the case, and may be safely shown to the jury, and trusted to the ordeal of cross-examination. If then an able counsel withholds his principal witness from the jury, he throws dirt upon his own case ; but he is not the man to throw dirt upon his own case except to escape a greater evil.

Now, what greater evil than throwing dirt upon his case can there be?

Only one,—his principal witness is always the very witness, who may kill his case on the spot, either by breaking down under cross-examination, or in some other way, which a wary counsel foresees.

Therefore, when either suitor through his counsel does not call his principal witness, the case is always rotten. History offers no example to the contrary, and only one apparent example, which better information corrected.

In fact, whenever with evidence against him, an able counsel dares not call his principal witness, the court might save time and verbiage by giving the verdict against him without any more palaver. Such a verdict would always stand.

You have a correspondent, who cannot see the superiority of indisputable coincidences, to "Jack swears that Jill says," and even to direct evidence contradicted by direct evidence. I will give this gentleman one more chance. Does he think that all judges are fools, ex officio, and all jurymen idiots by the effect of the sheriff's summons? If not, let him consult that vast experience of trials he must possess, or he would hardly have the presumption to teach me how to sift legal evidence, and let him ask himself did he ever know a judge and a jury, who went with any suitor, that dared not call his principal witness.

I know one case, but the verdict was upset. Does he know a single case? I doubt it. I will give one example out of thousands to the contrary, which I had from the lips of a very popular writer, beloved by all who knew him, the late Mr. Lever. It was a reminiscence of his youth. At some county assize in Ireland, counsel called the sort of witnesses I have defined above, as B, C, and D, but did not call witness A. The judge was a good lawyer, but not polished, having been born a peasant; but had none the less influence with country juries for that, perhaps rather more. He objected bluntly to this as a waste of time, and said the jury would expect to see witness A, and the sooner the better.

"My Lord," says the counsel, "I must be permitted to conduct my case according to my own judgment."

The judge raised no objection; only in return he claimed his right, which was to read a newspaper so long as the case was so conducted.

When counsel had had their say, my lord came out of his journal, fixed his eyes on the jury, and summed up. My deceased friend gave me every syllable of his summing up, and here it is :—

THE SHORTEST SUMMING-UP ON RECORD.

The Judge: "He didn't call his principal witness. WEE-Y-WHEET!"

This WEE-Y-WHEET, hitherto written for archæological reasons "Phengh," was a long, ploughman's whistle, with which my lord pointed his summing up, and such is the power of judicious brevity falling on people possessed of common sense, that the jury delivered their verdict like a shot against the ingenious suitor, who did not call his principal witness. It was in this same country, nevertheless, that, on the single occasion I have referred to, a jury gave the verdict to the party, who did not call his principal witness.

It was the great case of Campbell Craig versus Richard Earl of Anglesey. Craig, in this cause, was a mere instrument. James Annesley, claiming the lands and title of Anglesey, leased a farm to Craig. Anglesey expelled Craig. Craig sued Anglesey as lessee of James Annesley, and then disappeared from the proceedings. James Annesley, who had thirteen years before been kidnapped by this defendant, and sent out to the colonies, took these indirect proceedings as the son and heir of Lord and Lady Altham, to whose lands and title had succeeded, first a most respectable nobleman, the Earl of Anglesey, and, on his decease, his brother, the said Richard Annesley, both these succeeding Lord Altham in turn by apparent default of direct issue. James Annesley therefore had only to prove his legitimacy, as clearly as he proved this very defendant had kidnapped him by force—and the estates were his.

Now both parties agreed that James Annesley was the son of Lord Altham: but the defendant said James Annesley's mother was not Lady Altham, but one Joan Landy, a servant in Lord Altham's house, who nursed him from his birth, not in Lord Altham's house, but a cabin hard by, where he was admitted to have lived with her fifteen months. There was no parish register to settle the matter, and Lady Altham, an Englishwoman, driven out of the country many years before by her husband's brutality, had died in England, and never mentioned in England that she had a son in Ireland.

The plaintiff called a cloud of second-class witnesses, but he could not be got to call Joan Landy, who had such an absolute knowledge whether the boy was her child, or her nursling, as nobody else could have.

Defendant's counsel, Prime-Serjeant Malone, one of the greatest forensic reasoners the British Empire has produced, dwelt strongly upon the plaintiff's conduct in not showing this witness to the jury.

Here is his general position—"It is a rule that every case ought to be proved by the best testimony the nature of the thing will admit, and this Joan Landy was the very best witness that could have been produced on the side of the plaintiff." He then showed this without any difficulty, and afterwards made rather an extraordinary and significant statement. "The counsel on the other side did very early in this case promise we should see her: only, as she was the person that was to wind up the case, she was to be the plaintiff's last witness, and this was the reason given for not producing her till the trial was near an end." He adds that having kept her out of court on this pretence, they now shifted their ground and professed not to call her, "because she was a weak woman, and might forget or be put off the thread of her story."

This last theory he exposes with that admirable logic I find in all his recorded speeches, and urges that the plaintiff's counsel were simply afraid to subject their principal witness to the ordeal of cross-examination. The three judges—for it was a trial at bar—all ignored this strong point for the defence, and the jury steered themselves through a mass of contradictory evidence by an unsafe inference—the defendant had kidnapped the boy, and therefore the defendant, who as Lord Altham's brother, must have known all about the matter, had shown by his actions that he knew him to be legitimate.

James Annesley got the verdict. But the soundness of Malone's reasoning was soon demonstrated. A bill of exceptions was tendered and admitted, and pending its discussion, James Annesley's case was upset in a criminal trial. His impetuous friends indicted Mary Heath, a main pillar of the defence, for perjury. She was ably defended, and destroyed her accuser.* She brought home several perjuries to some of James Annesley's witnesses, and to the whole band of them in one vital matter. They had sworn in concert that the boy was christened on a certain day at Dunmore, his god-mother being Mrs. Pigot, and one of his godfathers Sergeant Cuff. Well, Mary Heath proved that Mrs. Pigot was nursing her husband with a broken leg 100 miles off, and showed by the records of the Court of Chancery that Sergeant Cuff moved the Court that very day in person, and in Dublin, 100 miles from Dunmore. After this James Annesley's case got blown more and more. The judges would not act on that verdict, and the Court of Chancery restrained him from taking fresh proceedings of a similar nature in the county Wexford. Public opinion turned dead against him. He was horse-whipped on the Curragh by the defendant, and showed his plebeian origin, by taking it like a lamb. Growing contempt drove him out of Ireland, and he lived in England upon his English connections, and fell into distress. His last public act was to raise a subscription at Richmond. This appears either in the "Annual Register" or the "Gentleman's Magazine" of the day—I forget which—but distinctly remember reading it in one or other of those repertoires.

His successful defendant outlived him, and held the title of Anglesey, and the Irish and English estates, till his death. After that he gave some trouble, because he had practised trigamy with such skill, that the English peers could not find out who was the legitimate heir to his earldom. The Irish peers, with the help of the logical Malone, cracked the nut in Ireland, and so saved the Irish titles. In this discussion James Annesley's pretensions were referred to, but only as an extinct matter and a warning to juries not to go by prejudice against evidence. See the minutes of the proceedings before the Irish Lords, published at Dublin by David Hay, 1773, p. 19, and elsewhere.

It certainly is curious that both counsel for the Claimant Orton should have been ignorant how the famous case of James Annesley terminated, and should have cited it in support of Orton; curious that both the judges should have submitted to so singular an error.

* See The King v. Mary Heath, published in pamphlet form.

However, there is a real parallel between the cases, though not what the learned counsel imagined. 1st. James Annesley was either an impostor or the tool of impostors, and Arthur Orton is an impostor. 2nd. James Annesley's counsel dared not call his principal witness, Joan Landy, and Arthur Orton's counsel dared not call his principal witnesses, viz., the sisters of Arthur Orton. Who, in this world, could settle the Orton question with one half the authority of these two ladies?

It was only to call them and let them look at the Claimant, and swear he was not Arthur Orton—and stand cross-examination.

Why was this not done? Withholding them from the jury threw dirt on all the other witnesses, who could only swear to the best of their belief, or offer reasons, not pure evidence.

The comments of Serjeant Malone on the absence of Joan Landy from the witness-box, Craig v. Anglesey, 322, all apply here; so does the ploughman's whistle of that sagacious judge; who economised the time of the court. It is not that the value of these ladies' evidence is not known. They have been got to sign affidavits that the man is not their brother. Why with this strong disposition to serve him could they not be trusted to the ordeal of an open court? Serjeant Malone puts it down to dread of cross-examination. There is, however, another thing on the cards which naturally escapes a lawyer, for their minds are not prepared for unusual things.

Lord and Lady Altham were both very dark. James Annesley was fair. Now, suppose Joan Landy was fair, and otherwise like the plaintiff, whom we now know to have been her child? Annesley's counsel may have been afraid to show her to the eyes of the jury, and her son sitting in their sight, as the evidence of John Purcell shows he was.

Old George Orton is said to have marked all his children, including the Claimant, pretty strongly. Suppose these two sisters are like George Orton, and the Claimant, sworn to be like George Orton, is also like these sisters, this would be a reason for showing the public their handwriting to a statement, and not showing a jury their faces. Between this and the dread of cross-examination lies the key to the phenomenon.

He didn't call his principal witness. Wee-y-wheet!

Enough has been said, I hope, to reconcile men of sense to the verdicts of two juries. The sentence is quite another matter. I do not approve it, and will give my reasons in a short letter, my last upon the whole subject.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE

OUR DARK PLACES.

TO THE GENTLEMEN OF THE PRESS.

No. I.

GENTLEMEN,

On Friday last, a tale was brought to me that a sane prisoner had escaped from a private madhouse, had just baffled an attempt to recapture him by violent entry into a dwelling-house, and was now hiding in the suburbs.

The case was grave: the motives alleged for his incarceration were sinister; but the interpreters were women, and consequently partisans, and some, though not all, the parties concerned on the other side, bear a fair character. Humanity said "look into the case!" Prudence said, "look at it on both sides." I insisted, therefore, on a personal interview with Mr. ——. This was conceded, and we spent two hours together: all which time I was of course testing his mind to the best of my ability.

I found him a young gentleman of a healthy complexion, manner vif, but not what one would call excited. I noticed however that he liked to fidget string, and other trifles between his finger and thumb at times. He told me his history for some years past, specifying the dates of several events: he also let me know he had been subject for two years to fits, which he described to me in full. I recognised the character of these fits. His conversation was sober and reasonable. But had I touched the exciting theme? We all know there is a class of madmen who are sober and sensible till the one false chord is struck. I came therefore to that delusion which was the original ground of ———'s incarceration.

tion; his notion that certain of his relations are keeping money from him that is his due.

This was the substance of his hallucination as he revealed it to me. His father was member of a firm with his uncle and others. Shortly before his death his father made a will leaving him certain personalties, the interest of £5,000, and, should he live to be twenty-four, the principal of ditto, and the reversion, after his mother's death, of another considerable sum.

Early last year he began to inquire why the principal due to him was not paid. His uncle then told him there were no assets to his father's credit, and never had been. On this, he admits, he wrote "abominably passionate" letters, and demanded to inspect the books. This was refused him, but a balance-sheet was sent him, which was no evidence to his mind, and did not bear the test of Addition, being £40,000 out on the evidence of its own figures. This was his tale, which might be all bosh for aught I could tell.

Not being clever enough to distinguish truth from fancy by divination, I took cab, and off to Doctors' Commons, determined to bring some of the above to book.

Well, gentlemen, I found the will, and I discovered that my maniac has understated the interest he takes under it. I also find, as he told me I should, his uncle's name down as one of the witnesses to the will. Item, I made a little private discovery of my own, viz., that — is residuary legatee, subject to his mother's life interest, and that all his interest under the will goes to five relations of the generation above him should he die intestate.

I now came to this conclusion, which I think you will share with me, that —'s delusion may or may not be an error, but cannot be a hallucination, since it is simply good logic founded on attested facts. For on which side lies the balance of credibility? The father makes a solemn statement that he has thousands of pounds to bequeath. The uncle assents in writing while the father is alive, but gives the father and himself the lie when the father is no longer on earth to contradict him. They say in law, "Allegans contraria non est audiendus."

Being now satisfied that the soi-disant delusion might be error but could not be aberration of judgment, I subjected him to a new class of proofs. I asked him if he would face medical men of real eminence, and not in league with madhouse doctors.

"He would with pleasure. It was his desire." We went first to Dr. Dickson, who has great experience, and has effected some remarkable cures of mania. Dr. Dickson, as may well be supposed, did not take as many seconds as I had taken hours. He laughed to scorn the very notion that the man was mad. "He is as sane as we are," said Dr. Dickson. From Bolton Street we all three go to Dr. Ruttledge, Hanover Square, and, on the road, Dr. Dickson and I agree to apply a test to Dr. Ruttledge, which it would have been on many accounts unwise to apply to a man of ordinary skill. Dr. Dickson introduced — and me thus:—"One of these is insane, said to be. Which is it?" Dr. Ruttledge took the problem mighty coolly, sat down by me first, with an eye like a diamond: it went slap into my marrow-bone. Asked me catching questions, touched my wrist, saw my tongue, and said quietly, "This one is sane." Then he went and sat down by — and drove an eye into him, asked him catching questions, made him tell him in order all he had done since seven o'clock, felt pulse, saw tongue: "This one is sane too." Dr. Dickson then left the room, after telling him what was —'s supposed delusion, and begged him to examine him upon it. The examination lasted nearly half an hour, during which — related the circumstances of his misunderstanding, his capture, and his escape, with some minuteness. The result of all this was a certificate of sanity; copy of which I subjoin. The original can be seen at my house by any lady or gentleman connected with literature or the press.

"We hereby certify that we have this day, both conjointly and separately, examined Mr. — and we find him to be in every respect of sound mind, and labouring under no delusion whatever. Moreover we entertain a very strong opinion that the said Mr. — has at no period of his life laboured under insanity.

"He has occasionally had epileptic fits.

This man, whose word I have no reason to doubt, says the keeper of the madhouse told him he should never go out of it.

This, if true, implies the absence of all intention to cure him. He was a customer, not a patient: he was not in a hospital, but in a gaol, condemned to imprisonment for life, a sentence so awful that no English judge has ever yet had the heart to pronounce it upon a felon. — is an orphan.

The law is too silly, and one-sided, and slow, to protect him against the prompt and daring men who are even now hunting him. But while those friends the God of the fatherless has raised him concert his defence, you can aid justice greatly by letting daylight in. I will explain why this is in my next.

GARRICK CLUB,

No. II

GENTLEMEN,

In England "Justice" is the daughter of "Publicity." In this, as in every other nation, deeds of villany are done every day in kid gloves; but they can only be done on the sly: here lies our true moral eminence as a nation. Our Judges are an honour to Europe, not because Nature has cut them out of a different stuff from Italian Judges: this is the dream of babies: it is because they sit in courts open to the public, and "sit next day in the newspapers."* Legislators who have not the brains to appreciate the Public, and put its sense of justice to a statesmanlike use, have yet an instinctive feeling that it is the great safeguard of the citizen. Bring your understandings to bear on the following sets of propositions in lunacy law:—First grand division—Maxims laid down by Shelford. "A. The law requires satisfactory evidence of insanity. B. Insanity in the eye of the law is nothing less than the prolonged departure, without an adequate external cause, from the state of feeling, and modes of thinking, usual to the individual when in health. C. The burthen of proof of insanity lies on those asserting its existence. D. Control over persons represented as insane is not to be assumed without necessity. E. Of all evidence, that of medical men ought to be given with the greatest care, and received with the utmost caution. F. The medical man's evidence should not merely pronounce the party insane, but give sufficient reasons for thinking so. For this purpose it behoves him to have investigated accurately the collateral circumstances. G. The imputations of friends or relations, &c., are not entitled to any weight or consideration in inquiries of this nature, but ought to be dismissed from the minds of the judge and jury, who are bound to form their conclusions from impartial evidence of facts, and not to be led astray by any such fertile sources of error and injustice."

The second class of propositions is well known to your readers. A relative has only to buy two doctors, two surgeons, or even two of those "whose poverty though not their will consents," and he can clap in a madhouse any rich old fellow that is spending his money absurdly on himself, instead of keeping it like a wise man for his heirs; or he can lock up any eccentric, bodily-afflicted, troublesome, account-sifting young fellow.

In other words, the two classes of people, who figure as suspected witnesses in one set of clauses, are made judge, jury, and executioner, in another set of clauses, one of which, by a refinement of injustice, shifts the burthen of proof from the accusers to the accused in all open proceedings subsequent to his wrongful imprisonment.—Shelford, 56.

Now what is the clue to this apparent contradiction—to this change in the weathercock of legislatorial morality? It is mighty simple. The maxims, No. 1, are the practice and principle that govern what are called "Commissions of Lunacy." At these the newspaper reporters are present. No. 2 are the practice and principle legalized, where no newspaper reporters are present. Light and darkness.

Since then the Law de Lunatico has herself told us that she is an idiot and a rascal when she works in the dark, but that she is wise, cautious, humane, and honest in the light, my orphan and myself should indeed be mad to disregard her friendly hint as to her double character. This, gentlemen, is why we come to you first: you must give us publicity, or refuse us justice. We will go to the Commissioners in Lunacy, but not before their turn. We dare not abjure experience. We know the Commissioners: we know them intus et in cute; we know them better than they know themselves. They are of two kinds, one kind I shall dissect elsewhere; the rest are small men afflicted with a common malady, a common-place conscience.

These soldiers of Xerxes won't do their duty if they can help it; if they can't, they will. With them justice depends on Publicity, and Publicity on you. Up with the lash!!

I am now instructed by him who has been called mad, but whose intelligence may prove a match for theirs, to propose to his enemies to join him in proving to the public that their convictions are as sincere as his. The wording of the challenge being left to me, I invite them to an issue, thus:—"My lads, you were game to enter a dwelling-house kept by women, and proposed to break open a woman's chamber-door, till a woman standing on the other side with a cudgel, threatened 'to split your skulls,' and that chilled your martial ardour.

Illa virago viri.

"And now you are wasting your money (and you will want it all), dressing up policemen, setting spies, and in short, doing the Venetian business in England; and all for what? You want our orphan's body. Well, it is to be had without all this dirty manœuvring, and silly small treachery. Go to Jonathan Weymouth, Esq., of Clifford's Inn. He is our orphan's solicitor, duly appointed and instructed: he will accept service of a writ de lunatico inquirendo, and on the writ being served, Mr. Weymouth will enter into an undertaking with you to produce the body of E. P. F. in court, to abide the issue of a daylight investigation. If you prove him mad, you will take him away with you; if you fail to make him out mad before a disinterested judge, at all events you will prove yourselves to be honest, though somewhat hard-hearted, men and women."

Should this proposal be accepted, the proceedings of our opponents will then assume a respectability that is wanting at present, and in that case these letters will cease. Sub judice lis erit.

Your obedient servant,
CHARLES READE.

GARRICK CLUB, October.

GENTLEMEN,

My last letter concluded by inviting the person, who had incarcerated my orphan on the plea of insanity, to prove that, whether mistaken or not, he was sincere. No such evidence has been offered. He has therefore served a writ upon this person, and will proceed to trial with all possible expedition, subject of course to the chances of demurrer, or nonsuit.*

It would not be proper to say more, pendente lite. But, some shallow comments having been printed elsewhere, it seems fair that those Editors, who had the humanity, the courtesy, and, let me add, the intelligence, to print my letters, should possess this proof that their columns have not been trifled with by

Their obliged
And obedient servant,

* Individually I entertain no apprehension on this score. The constitutional rights of Englishmen are safe in the hands of the present judges; and trial by jury, in a case of this character, is one of those rights—provided, of course, the proper Defendant has been sued.

No. IV.

Cunctando restituit rem."

GENTLEMEN,

When, four months ago, I placed my orphan under the wing of the law, I hoped I had secured him that which is every Englishman's right, a trial by judge and jury; and need draw no further upon your justice and your pity. I have clung to this hope in spite of much sickness of heart, month after month: but at last both hope and faith are crushed in me, and I am forced to see, that without a fresh infusion of publicity, my orphan has no reasonable hope of getting a public trial, till he shall stand with his opponents before the God of the fatherless. I do not say this merely because his trial has been postponed, and postponed, but because it has been thrice postponed on grounds that can be reproduced three hundred times just as easily as thrice, unless the light of publicity is let in.

Let me premise that the matters I have to relate are public acts, and as proper for publication and criticism as any other judicial proceedings, and that they will make the tour of Europe and the United States in due course. When the day of trial drew near in November last, defendant's attorney applied to have trial postponed for a month or two, for the following sole reason:—He swore, first, that a Mr. 3 Stars, dwelling at Bordeaux, was a witness without whom defendant could not safely proceed to trial; and he swore, second, that said 3 Stars had written to him on the 18th November, that, owing to an accident on the railway, he was then confined to his room, and had little hope of being able to leave Bordeaux under a month. No. 1, you will observe, is legal evidence: but No. 2 is no approach towards legal evidence. Nothing is here sworn to but the fact that there exists an unsworn statement by a Mr. 3 Stars. On this demi-semi-affidavit, unsupported by a particle of legal evidence, a well-meaning judge, in spite of a stiff remonstrance, postponed the trial, nominally for one month, really for two months. I fear my soul is not so candid as the worthy judge's, for on the face of this document, where he saw veracity, I saw disingenuousness, stand out in alto relievo. So I set the French police upon Mr. 3 Stars, and received from the Prefect of La Gironde an official document, a copy of which is enclosed herewith. By it we learn, first, that the accident or incident was not what plain men understand by an accident on a railway. The man hurt a leg getting down from a railway carriage, just as he might from his own gig. Second, that it was not quite so recent as his suppression of date might lead a plain man to presume, but was three weeks old when he wrote as above; third, that he must have been well long before the 9th of December, for, writing on that day, the Prefect describes him as having made frequent excursions into Medoc since his incident. Unfair inaccuracy once proved in so important a statement, all belief is shaken. In all human probability, Mr. 3 Stars was convalescent on the 18th November, viz., three weeks after his railway incident. But it is certain he was well on or about the 1st December, and that, consequently, he could with ease have attended that trial, which his statement that he could not move till about the 18th December caused to be put off for two months. What man who knows the world can help suspecting that the arbitrary period of a month was arranged between him and the attorney, not so much with reference to the truth as to the sittings of the Court at Westminster upon special jury cases?

So much for abjuring the experience of centuries, and postponing an alleged lunatic's trial for two months, upon indirect testimony that would be kicked out of a County Court in a suit for a wheelbarrow: hearsay stuccoed, nursery evidence; not legal evidence.

Well, gentlemen, the weary months crawled on, and the lame, old, broken-winded, loitering beldame, British justice, hobbled up to the scratch again at last. Mr. 3 Stars was now in England. That sounded well. But he soon showed us that—

“Cœlum non animam mutant qui trans mare currunt.”

His health still fluctuated to order. Pretty well as to the wine trade; very sick as to the Court of Queen's Bench. He comes from Bordeaux to London (and that is a good step), burning, we are told, to attend the trial at Westminster. The trial draws near: he whips off—to Hampstead? No;—to Wales. Arrived there, he writes, in due course, to his late colleague in affidavit, that he can't travel. This time the gentleman that does the interlocutory swearing for the defendant (let us call him Fabius), doubting whether the 3 Stars malady would do again by itself, associated with his "malade affidavitaire" two ladies, whom, until they compel me to write a fifth letter, I will call Mrs. Plausible and Mrs. Brand. Non-legal evidence as before. Fabius swears, not that 3 Stars is ill; that might have been dangerous; but that 3 Stars says he is ill: which is true. Item that Mrs. Brand cannot cross the ditch that parts France from England, because she has had an operation performed. It turns out to have been twelve months ago. Item, Fabius swears that Mrs. Plausible says, the little Plausibles have all got scarlatina; and, therefore, Fabius swears that Mrs. Plausible thinks the constitutional rights of the English people ought to remain in doubt and suspense, in the person of our orphan, till such time as the said scarlatina has left her nursery (and the measles not arrived?), "A tout bambin tout bonheur."

All which conjectural oaths, and sworn conjectures, and nursery dialectics, they took to Mr. Justice Erle, of all gentlemen in the world; and moved to postpone the trial indefinitely. Early in the argument their counsel having, I think, gone through the schools at Oxford, took a distaste to the Irish syllogism that gleamed on his brief; videlicet, no witness who has scarlatina can come to Westminster and stand cross-examination by Q.C. Little b, c, and d are not witnesses but have got scarlatina.

Ergo, capital A can't come to Westminster and stand cross-examination by Q.C.

Counsel threw over Mrs. Plausible and Hibernian logic generally, and stood on the 3 Stars malady, second edition, and the surgical operation that was only twelve months old. But Mr. Justice Erle declined to postpone human justice till sickness and shamming should be no more. He refused to ignore the plaintiff, held the balance, and gave them a just and reasonable delay, to enable them to examine their "malades affidavitaires" upon commission. He was about to fix Saturday, Jan. 5, for the trial. They then pleaded hard for Monday. This was referred to plaintiff's attorney, who conceded that point. Having accepted this favour, which was clearly a conditional one, and only part of the whole arrangement, they were, I THINK, bound by professional good faith not to disturb the compact. They held otherwise: they instantly set to work to evade Mr. Justice Erle's order, by tinkering the Irish syllogism. In just the time that it would take to send Mrs. Plausible a letter, and say it is no use the little Plausibles having scarlatina; you must have it yourself, madam; you had better have it by telegraph—Mrs. Plausible announces the desired malady, but not upon oath. "Scarlatina is easily said." Il va sans dire que they don't venture before Mr. Justice Erle again with their tinkered affidavit. They slip down to Westminster, and surprise a fresh judge, who has had no opportunity of watching the rise and progress of disease. Their counsel reads the soldered affidavit. Plaintiff's counter affidavits are then intrusted to him to read. What does he do? He reads the preamble, but burks the affidavits. The effect was inevitable. Even bastard affidavits cannot be met by rhetoric. They can only be encountered by affidavits. Judges decide, not on phrases, but on the facts before them. Plaintiff's facts being silenced, and defendant's stated, the judge naturally went with defendant, and postponed the trial. (No. 3.)

Now, gentlemen, I am the last man in the world to cry over spilled milk. I don't come to you to tinker the untinkerable past, but, for the future, to ask a limit to injustice in its worst form, trial refused.

Without your help, this alleged lunatic is no nearer the term of his sufferings; no nearer the possibility of removing that frightful stigma, which is not stigma only, but starvation; no nearer to trial of his sanity by judge and jury, than he was four months ago. True, there are now three judges who will not easily be induced to impede the course of justice in this case; but there are other uninformed judges who may be surprised into doing it general. Fabius can at any day of any month swear that some male or female witness says she wants to come into the witness-box, and can't. And so long as "Jack swears that Jill says" is confounded with legal evidence, on interlocutory motions, justice can be defeated to the end of time, under colour of postponement. Gentlemen, it is a known fact among lawyers that, in nine cases out of ten, postponement of trial has no other real object but evasion of trial by tiring out the plaintiff, or breaking his heart, or ruining him in expenses.

I see little reason whatever to doubt that this is a principal object here. Defendants have a long purse. Plaintiff is almost a pauper in fact, whatever he may be in law. Mr. 3 Stars, sworn to as an essential witness, has not seen the boy for years. How can he, therefore, be a very essential witness to his insanity at or about the period of his capture? Dr. Pillbox and Mr. Sawbones must be better cards so far: in a suit at law the evidence of insanity, like that of sanity, cannot be spread out thin over disjointed years, like the little bit of butter on a schoolboy's bread. Mr. 3 Stars may be an evidence as to figures: but then the books are to be in court subpoena; and nobody listens much to any of us swearing arithmetic, when a ledger is speaking. The lady I have called Mrs. Plausible, would not, in my humble opinion, go into a witness-box if she were paid a hundred pounds a minute. I mean this anything but discourteously.

I implore all just and honest men, especially those who are in the service of the State, to try and realise the frightful situation in which postponement of trial keeps an alleged lunatic. The blood-hounds are hunting him all this time. There were several men looking after him the very last day he lost his hopes of immediate trial. Suppose that, on unsubstantial grounds, and illegal evidence, time should be afforded to find him out and settle the questions of fact and law, by brute force, what complexion would these thoughtless delays of justice assume then in the eye of the nation; ay, and, to do them justice, in the consciences of those whose credulity would have made the blood-hounds of a lunatic asylum masters of an argument that has been now for many months referred to the Lord Chief Justice of England and a special jury. Mind, the constitution has been tampered with; "habeas corpus" has been suspended by the boobies that framed the Lunacy Acts. The judges have power to impede justice, but none to impede injustice. In these peculiar cases, I am advised, they can't order a sane man out of a lunatic asylum into the witness-box. Justice hobbles, but injustice flies to its mark. I declare to you that I live in mortal terror lest some evil should befall this man, under the very wing of the court—not of course from the defendant—but from some member or members of the gang of stupid ruffians I am assured are still hanging about the skirts of the defence; men some of whom have both bloodshed and reasonshed on their hands already. My very housemaids have been tampered with to discover where "the pursuer," as the Scotch call him, is hiding and quaking. Is such an anomaly to be borne? Is a man to be at the same time run from with affidavits and chased with human blood-hounds? Is this a state of things to be prolonged, without making our system the scorn and laughing-stock of all the citizens and lawyers of Europe?

Fletcher v. Fletcher only wants realising. But some people are so stupid, they can realise nothing that they have not got in their hands, their mouths or their bellies. This is no common case; no common situation. This particular Englishman sues not merely for damages, but to recover lost rights dearer far than money, of which rights he says he is unjustly robbed; his right to walk in daylight on the soil of his native land, without being seized and chained up for life like a nigger or a dog; his footing in society, his means of earning bread, and his place among mankind. For a lunatic is a beast in the law's eye and society's; and an alleged lunatic is a lunatic until a jury pronounces him sane.

I appeal to you, gentlemen, is not such a suitor sacred in all good men's minds? Is he not defendant as well as plaintiff? Why, his stake is enormous compared with the nominal defendant's; and, if I know right from wrong, to postpone his trial a fourth time, without a severe necessity, would be to insult Divine justice, and trifle with human misery, and shock the common sense of nations.

I am,

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES READE.

With this a copy is enclosed of the French Prefect's letter, and other credentials. These documents are abandoned to your discretion.

Nothing in the above letter is to be construed as assuming that the defendant has a bad case. He may have a much better one than the plaintiff. I am not asking for the latter a verdict to which he may have no right; but a trial, to which he has every right.

BORDEAUX, le 9 Décembre, 1858.

MONSIEUR,

EN réponse à la lettre que vous m'avez adressée, à la date du 26 Novembre dernier, j'ai l'honneur de vous transmettre les renseignements qui m'ont été fournis sur le S^r Cunliffe, sujet anglais.

Le S^r Cunliffe demeure à Bordeaux, rue Corie, 43. Il est négociant en vins et paraît jouir de l'estime des personnes qui le connaissent.

Il est vrai qu'un accident lui est arrivé, il y a un mois et demi, sur le chemin de fer; il est tombé en descendant et s'est blessé à une jambe; par suite il a gardé le lit pendant quelque temps, mais aujourd'hui il paraît être rétabli; vaque à ses occupations ordinaires et fait souvent des excursions dans le Médoc, à quelques lieues de Bordeaux.

Recevez, Monsieur, l'assurance de ma parfaite considération,

Le Préfet de la Gironde,

(Signed)

A MONSIEUR CHARLES READE,

6, BOLTON ROW, MAYFAIR, LONDRES.

In spite of letter four: the trial was postponed twice more.

At last it came and is reported in The Times of July 8, 1859. The court was filled with low repulsive faces of mad-house attendants and keepers, all ready to swear the man was insane. He was put into the witness-box, examined and cross-examined eight hours, and the defendant succumbed without a struggle. The coming damages were compounded for an annuity of £100 a year, £50 cash, and the costs.

As bearing upon this subject, my letter to the Pall Mall Gazette of Jan. 17, 1870, entitled "How Lunatics' Ribs get Broken," should be read. This letter is now reprinted at the beginning of Hard Cash.

THE RIGHTS AND THE WRONGS OF AUTHORS.

FIRST LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE."

SIR,—Those, who do not bestow sympathy, have no right to ask it. But if a man for years has been quick to feel, and zealous to relieve, his neighbour's wrongs, he has earned a right to expose his own griefs and solicit redress. By the same rule, should a class, that has openly felt and tried to cure the wrongs of others, be deeply wronged itself, that class has a strong claim to be heard. For the public and the State to turn a deaf ear would be ungrateful, and also impolitic; it would be a breach of the mutual compact that cements society, and tend to discourage the public virtue of that worthy class, and turn its heart's milk to gall.

Now, the class "authors" may be said to rain sympathy. That class has produced the great Apostle of Sympathy in this age; and many of us writers follow in his steps, though we cannot keep up with his stride. In the last fifty years legislation and public opinion have purged the nation of many unjust and cruel things; but who began the cure? In most cases it can be traced to the writer's pen, and his singular power and habit of sympathizing with men whose hard case is not his own. Accordingly, in France and some other countries this meritorious and kindly class is profoundly respected, and its industry protected as thoroughly as any other workman's industry. But in Great Britain and her colonies, and her great off-shoot, the class is personally undervalued, and its property too often pillaged as if it was the production of an outlaw or a beaver. The notorious foible of authors is disunion; but our wrongs are so bitter, that they have at last driven us, in spite of our besetting infirmity, into a public league for protection,* and they drive me to your columns for sanctuary. I ask leave to talk common sense, common justice, common humanity, plain arithmetic, and plain English, to the Anglo-Saxon race, about the property of authors—a theme which has hitherto been rendered unintelligible to that race by bad English, technical phrases, romantic pettifogging, cant, equivokes, false summing, direct lies, roundabout sentences, polysyllables, and bosh. Do not fear that I will abuse the public patience with sentimental grievances. I have lived long enough to see that each condition of life has its drawbacks, and no class must howl whenever the shoe pinches, or the world would be a kennel, sadly sonorous in the minor key. I will just observe, but in a cheerful spirit, that in France the sacred word “Academy” means what it meant of old—a lofty assemblage of writers and thinkers, with whom princes are proud to mingle; and that in England the sacred word is taken from writers and thinkers, and bestowed with jocular blasphemy upon a company of painters and engravers, most of them bad ones; that the great Apostle of Sympathy, when dead, is buried by acclamation in Westminster Abbey, but is not thought worthy of a peerage while living, yet a banker is, who can show no title to glory but a lot of money; that what puny honours a semi-barbarous but exceeding merry State bestows on the fine arts are given in direct ratio to their brainlessness—music, number one; painting, number two; fiction, the king of the fine arts, number nothing;—that authors pay the Queen’s taxes and the parochial rates, and yet are compelled to pay a special and unjust tax to public libraries, while painters, on the contrary, are allowed to tax the public full fifteen thousand pounds a year for leave to come into a public shop, built with public money, and there buy the painters’ pictures. All these are Anglo-Saxon humours, that rouse the contempt of the Latin races, but they cannot starve a single author and his family; so we leave them to advancing civilization, political changes, and the ridicule of Europe.

But insecurity of property is a curse no class can endure,

* The Association to Protect the Rights of Authors, 28, King Street

nor is bound to endure. It is a relic of barbarism. Every nation has groaned under it at some period; but, while it lasted, it always destroyed happiness and goodness. It made fighting and bloodshed a habit, and criminal retaliation a form of justice. Insecurity of property saps public and private morality; it corrupts alike the honest and the dishonest. It eggs on the thief, and justifies the pillaged proprietor in stealing all round, since in him theft is but retribution. Under this horrible curse there still groans a solitary class of honest, productive workmen, the Anglo-Saxon author, by which word I mean the writer, who receives no wages, and therefore his production becomes his property, and his sole means of subsistence. To make his condition clear to plain men, I will place him in a row with other productive workmen and show the difference:—

1. His own brother, the Anglo-Saxon writer for wages, is never robbed of a shilling. He has the good luck not to be protected by feeble statutes, but by the law of the land at home and abroad.

2. His first cousin, the Latino-Celtic author, has his property, made secure by the common law of his nation, and efficient statutes, criminal as well as civil.

3. The painter, the cabinet-maker, the fisherman, the basket-maker, and every other Anglo-Saxon workman, who uses his own or open materials, and, receiving no wages, acquires the production, has that production secured to him for ever by the common law with criminal as well as civil remedies.

Only the Anglo-Saxon author has no remedy against piracy under the criminal law, and feeble remedies by statute, which, as I shall show, are sometimes turned from feeble to null by the misinterpretations of judges, hostile (through error) to the spirit and intention of the statute. The result of this mess is that the British author's property is pillaged at home ten times oftener than any other productive workman's property; that in Australia he is constantly robbed, though his rights are not as yet publicly disputed; that in Canada he is picked out as the one British subject to be half-outlawed; and that he is fully and formally outlawed in the United States, though the British writer for wages is not outlawed there, nor the British mechanical inventor, nor the British printers—these artizans are paid for printing in the United States a British author's production—nor the British actor; he delivers in New York for five times as many dollars as his performance is worth those lines, which the British author has created with five times his labour and his skill, yet that author's remuneration is outlawry.

Unjust and cruel as this is, the other Anglo-Saxon authors are still worse used, especially the American author. He suffers the same wrongs we do, and a worse to boot. Our home market is not seriously injured by American piracy, but his home market is. The remuneration of the established American author is artificially lowered by the crushing competition of stolen goods; and, as for the young American author, however promising his genius, he is generally nipped in the bud. I can give the very process. He brings the publisher his manuscript, which represents months of labour and of debt, because all the time a man is writing without wages the butcher's bill and baker's are growing fast and high. His manuscript is the work of an able novice; there are some genuine observations of American life and manners, and some sparks of true mental fire; but there are defects of workmanship: the man needs advice and practice. Well, under just laws his countryman, the publisher, would nurse him; but, as things are, he declines to buy, at ever so cheap a rate, the work of promise, because he can obtain gratis works written with a certain mechanical dexterity by humdrum but practised English writers. Thus stale British mediocrity, with the help of American piracy, drives rising American genius out of the book market. Now, as the United States are not defiled with any other trade, art, or business, in which an American can be crushed under the competition of stolen goods, the rising author, being an American, and therefore not an idiot, flings American authorship to the winds, and goes into some other trade, where he is safe from foul play. At this moment many an American, who, under just laws, would have been a great author, is a second-rate lawyer, a second-rate farmer, or a third-rate parson: others overflow the journals, because there they write, not for property, but wages, and so escape from bad statute law to the common law of England and the United States. But this impairs the just balance of ephemeral and lasting literature. It creates an excess of journalists. This appears by four tests—the small remuneration of average journalists; the prodigious number of native journals compared with native books; the too many personalities in those too many journals; and the bankruptcy of 800 journals per annum.

Now I am ashamed to say all this injudicious knavery had its root in England. It was here the words were first spoken and written which, being thoughtlessly repeated by statesmen, judges, writers of law books, and now and then by publicists, have gradually deluded the mind and blunted the conscience of the Anglo-Saxon. That great race is inferior to none in common sense, respect for property, small as well as great, and impartial justice. To be false to all these, its characteristic and most honourable traits, it must be under some strong delusions. I will enumerate these, and show that they have neither truth, reason, common law, nor antiquity to support them; and I hope, with God's help and the assistance of those able men I may convince, to root them out of the Anglo-Saxon mind, and so give the Anglo-Saxon conscience fair play.

CHARLES READE.

SECOND LETTER.

SIR,—The four main delusions that set the public heart against authors' rights are:—

1. THE ÆTHERIAL MANIA.—That an author is a disembodied spirit, and so are his wife and children. That to refuse an unsalaried fisherman an exclusive title to the fish he has laboured for in the public sea would starve the fisherman and his family; but the same course would not starve the unsalaried author, his wife, and his children. Those little imps may seem to cry for bread; but they are squeaking for ideas. The ætherial mania intermits, like every other. Its lucid intervals coincide with the visits of the rent-gatherer, the tax-gatherer, and the tradesmen with their bills. On these occasions society admits that an author is a solid, and ought to pay or smart; but returns to æther when the funds are to be acquired, without which rent, taxes, and tradesmen cannot be paid, nor life, far less respectability, sustained. No Anglo-Saxon can look the ætherial crotchet in the face and not laugh at it. Yet so subtle and insidious is Prejudice, that you shall find your Anglo-Saxon constantly arguing and acting as if this nonsense was sense: and, pray believe me, the most dangerous of all our lies are those silly, skulking, falsehoods, which a man is ashamed to state, yet lets them secretly influence his mind and conduct. Lord Camden, the great enemy of authors in the last century, was an example. Compel him to look the ætherial mania in the face, and his good sense would have revolted. Yet, dissect his arguments and his eloquence, you will find they are both secretly founded on the ætherial mania, and stand or fall with it.

2. AN HISTORICAL FALSEHOOD.—That intellectual property is not founded on the moral sense of mankind, nor on the common law of England, but is the creature of modern statutes, and an arbitrary invasion of British liberty. This falsehood is as dangerous as it looks innocent. It crosses the Atlantic, and blunts the American conscience: and it even vitiates the judicial mind at home. It works thus down at Westminster. The judges there hate and despise Acts of Parliament. They make no secret of it; they sneer at them openly on the judgment seat, filling foreigners with amazement. Therefore, when once they get into their heads that a property exists only by statute, that turns their hearts against the property, and they feel bound to guard common-law liberties against the arbitrary restrictions of that statute. Interpreted in this spirit, a statute, and the broad intention of those who framed it, can be baffled in many cases, that the Legislature could not foresee, of which I shall give glaring examples.

3. That the laws protecting intellectual property enable authors to make more money than they deserve, and that piratical publishers sell books, not for love of lucre, but for the public, and for half the price of copyrighted books. I will annihilate this falsehood, not by reasoning, but by palpable facts and figures.

4. The worst delusion of all is, that what authors, and the Legislature, call intellectual property is neither a common law property nor a property created by statute, but a monopoly created by statute.

This confusion of ideas, unknown to our ancestors, and at variance with the distinctive terms they used, was first advanced by Mr. Justice Yates in the year 1769. He repeated it eight times in Millar v. Taylor; and, indeed, without it his whole argument falls to the ground. The fallacy has never been exposed with any real mental power, and has stultified senatorial and legal minds by the thousand. It was adopted and made popular by Macaulay in the House of Commons, February 14, 1841. He was on a subject that required logic; he substituted rhetoric, and said striking things. He said, "Copyright is monopoly, and produces all the effects the general voice of mankind attributes to monopoly." In another part of his rhetoric he defined copyright "a tax on readers to give a bounty to authors;" and this he evidently thought monstrous, the remuneration to producers in general not being an item that falls on the public purchaser; but, where he learned that, only God, who made him, knows. In another part he stigmatized copyright as "a monopoly in books." He did not carry out these conclusions honestly. Holding them, it was his duty to advocate the extinction of intellectual property; but, if his conclusions were weak, his premises were deadly. He took a poisoned arrow out of the custody of a few pettifoggers, and put it into the hands of ten thousand knaves and fools; where the respected word "property" had stood for ages, he and the pettifogger Yates, whom he echoed, set up the hated word "monopoly." "Rank weeds do grow apace;" this fallacy spread swiftly from the Senate to the bar, from the bar to the bench. I have with my own ears heard the Barons of the Exchequer call copyright a monopoly; nor is the expression confined to that court; it is adopted by writers of law-books, and so infects the minds of the growing lawyers. But only consider the effect—Here is a property the great public never reads about nor understands, and is therefore at the mercy of its public teachers. It hears the mouthpieces of law, and the mouthpieces of opinion, declare from their tribunals that the strange, unintelligible property called by the inhuman and unintelligible name of "copyright" is a monopoly. The public has at last got a word with a meaning. It knows what monopoly is, knows it too well. This nation has groaned under monopolies, and still smarts under their memory. It abhors the very sound, and thinks that whoever baffles a monopoly sides with divine justice and serves the nation. Therefore to call an author's property a monopoly is to make the conscience of the pirate easy, and even just men apathetic when an author is swindled; it is to prejudice both judges and juries, and prepare the way to false verdicts and disloyal judgments. I pledge myself to prove it is one of the stupidest falsehoods that muddleheads ever uttered, and able but unguarded men ever repeated. I undertake to prove this to the satisfaction of the Anglo-Saxon race, and of all the honest lawyers who have been decoyed into the error, and have delivered it as truth from the judgment seat this many a year. At present I will only say that if any statesman or practical lawyer, or compiler of law books, who either by word of mouth or in print has told the public "copyright" is a "monopoly," dares risk his money on his brains, I will meet him on liberal terms. I will bet him a hundred and fifty pounds to fifty copyright is not a monopoly, and is property. All I claim is capable referees. Let us say Lord Selborne, Mr. Robert Lowe, and Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, if those gentlemen will consent to act. I offer the odds, so I think I have a right to demand discriminating judges. If any gentleman takes up this bet I will ask him to do it publicly by letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, and we will then proceed to deposit the stakes, &c.*

From all these cruel delusions I draw one comfort: perhaps authors are not hated after all, but only misunderstood; and, if we can enlighten the mind of statesmen, lawyers, and the public, we may find the general heart as human to us as ours has always been to our fellow-citizens, and they don't deny it.

The two great properties of authors are "copyright," or the sole right of printing and reprinting for sale the individual work a man has honestly created, and "stage-right," or the sole right of representing the same for money on a public stage. The men who violate these rights have for ages been called pirates. The terms "copyright" and "stage-right" are our calamities. They keep us out of the Anglo-Saxon heart by parting us from its language. France calls them both by one name, "les droits d'auteurs;" and it is partly the long use of this human phrase that has made France so just and humane to authors. Warned by this experience, I pause in alarm before these repulsive words, that stand like a bristling wall between us and manly sympathy; and I implore the reader of these letters to be very intelligent, to open his mind to evidence that under these unfortunate and technical words lie great human realities; that both rights mean property, and that to infringe either property has just the same effect on an author as to rob his house; but to infringe them habitually by defect of law or judicial prejudice is far more fatal; the burglar only takes an author's superfluities, but the unchecked pirate takes his house itself, and, indeed, his livelihood:

* No person has ever ventured to encounter Mr. Reade, and risk his money on his opinion that copyright is a monopoly.

You take my house, when you do take the prop
That doth sustain my house; you take my life,
When you do take the means whereby I live.

I do earnestly beg the reader, then, in the name of wisdom, justice, humanity and Christianity, not to be baffled by a miserable husk where there is really a rich kernel; not to let the technical appearance of two words divert him from a serious effort to comprehend the rights and the wrongs of those men, living, whose insensible remains he worships when dead. In face of eternal justice the dead and the living author are one man; the dead is an author who was alive yesterday; the living is an author who will be dead to-morrow. In a word, then, take away or mutilate either of the properties so unfortunately named, and you remove the sole check of piracy; but, piracy unchecked, the ruin and starvation of authors, and the extinction of literature follow as inevitably as sunset follows noon. To give the reader a practical insight into this, I will select literary piracy, or infringement of copyright, and show its actual working. The composition is the true substance of a book; the paper, ink, and type are only the vehicles. The volumes combine the substance and the vehicles, and are the joint product of many artizans, and a single artist, the author. The artizans, to wit, the paper-makers, compositors, pressmen, and binders, are all paid, whether the book succeeds or fails. To go from the constructors to the sellers, you find the same distinction; the retail bookseller takes the enormous pull of 25 per cent. on every copy, yet the failure of the work entails no loss on him—unless he overstocks himself—because he is paid out of the gross receipts. But the author and the publisher take their turn last, and can only be paid out of profits. Where there is a loss it must all fall on author or publisher, or both. Now, books not being so necessary to human life as food or clothing, publishing is a somewhat speculative trade. It is calculated that out of, say, ten respectable books, about half do not pay their expenses, and of the other five four yield but a moderate profit both to author and publisher, but that the tenth may be a hit and largely remunerative to publisher and author, supposing those two to share upon fair terms. But here comes in the pirate. That caitiff does not print from manuscripts nor run risks. He holds aloof from literary enterprise till comes the rare book that makes a hit. Then he and his fellows rush upon it, tear the property limb from jacket, and destroy the honest shareholders' solitary chance of balancing their losses. The pirate who reprints from a proprietor's type, and reaps gratis the fruit of the publisher's early advertisements, and does not pay the author a shilling, can always undersell the honest author or the honest publisher, who pays the author, and buys publicity by advertising, and sets up type from manuscript, which process costs more than reprinting. This reduces the honest author's and publisher's business to two divisions: the unpopular books—often the most valuable to the public—by which they lose money or gain too little to live and pay shop, staff, &c.; and the popular book, by which they would gain money, but cannot, because the pirates rush in and share, and undersell, and crush, and kill. I appeal to all the trades and all the arts if any trade or any art ever did live, ever will live, or can live, upon such terms? The trade—all commercial enterprise requires capital, and all genuine capital is timorous and flies from insecure property. The art—to produce popular books requires, as a rule, such intelligence and capacity for labour, as need not starve for ever, but can go in the course of a generation, and after much individual misery, from literature to some easier profession. Therefore, piracy drives out both capital and brains, and marks out for ruin the best literature, and would extinguish it if not severely checked. This is evident, but it does not rest on speculation. History proves it. Piracy drove Goldoni out of Italy, where he was at the top of the tree, into France, and made him end his days a writer of French pieces for the one godlike nation, that treated a pirate like any other thief, and a foreign author like a French author; piracy extinguished an entire literature in Belgium; piracy, A.D. 1875, stifles a gigantic literature in the United States; piracy for a full century has lowered the British and American drama three hundred per cent.; A. D. 1694, the protection afforded to copyright by the licensing acts being removed, literary piracy obtained a firm footing in England for a time. What followed? In a very few years a handful of hungry pirates reduced both authors and respectable publishers to ruin, them, and their families. This was sworn and proved before Queen Anne's Parliament, and stands declared and printed in their Copyright Act, A. D. 1709. Those collected examples of honest artists, and traders, ruined by piracy are hidden for a time in the Record Office; but there are many sad and public proofs that piracy can break an honest trader's heart, or an honest workman's. I will select two out of hundreds. The ill-fated scholar we call Stephanus was not only ruined but destroyed, mind and body, by a piratical abridgment. He found the Greek language without a worthy lexicon. He spent twenty years compiling one out of the classical authors. It was and is a gigantic monument of industry and learning. He printed it with his own press and rested from his labours; he looked at his Colossus with honest pride, and boasted on the title page, very pardonably, Me duce plana via est, quæ salebrosa fuit.

What was his reward? A man, who had eaten his bread for years as a journeyman printer, sat down, and without any real labour, research or scholarship, produced in one volume an abridgment of the great lexicon. With this the miscreant undersold his victim and stopped his sale, and ruined him. In his anguish at being destroyed by his own labour stolen, the great scholar and printer went mad, and died soon after.

The composer of our National Anthem surely deserved a crust to keep body and soul together. Well, piracy would not let him have one. His immortal melodies sold for thousands of pounds, but the pirates stole it all and never gave the composer a farthing. At eighty years of age he hung himself in despair to escape starvation. The old cling to life—goodness knows why; it is very rare for a man of eighty to commit suicide; but, when an inventor sees brainless thieves rich by pillaging his brains, and is gnawed by hunger, as well as the heart's agony and injustice too bitter to bear, what wonder if he curses God and man, and ends the intolerable swindle how he can. The malpractice, which could murder the composer of our National Anthem, has surely some little claim to national disgust, and the legal restraints upon that malpractice to a grain of sympathy. Well, its only restraints upon earth are not justice nor humanity—it mocks at these—but copyright and stage-right, whose ugly sound pray forgive, and listen to their curious history.

CHARLES READE.

THIRD LETTER.

SIR,—The Greeks and Romans and Saxons had no printing press, and no theatres taking money at the doors. It is idle to search antiquity, or even mediæval England, for copyright, or stage-right, or my right to my Cochin China hen and every chick she hatches. "Bonæ legis est ampliare jura;" common law, old as its roots are, has at every period of its existence expanded its branches, because its nature is the reverse of a parliamentary enactment, and is such as permits it to apply old principles to new contingencies; to bloodhounds, potatoes, straw-paper, the printing press, each as they rise. Copyright and stage-right, and many other recent rights, grew out of two old principles of common law; and these laid hold of the printing press and the theatre as soon as they could and how they could. The first old principle is this: Productive and unsalaried labour, if it clash with no property, creates a property. All the uncaught fish in the sea belong to the public. Yet every caught fish comes to hand private property, because productive labour, when it clashes with no precedent title, creates property at common law.

The second old principle is this. Law abhors divestiture, or forfeiture of property. From time immemorial the law of England has guarded property against surmises and surprises by defining the terms on which it will permit divestiture. They are two—"consensus" and "delictum;" that is to say, "clear consent" and "long neglect," each to be proved before a jury.

By the first principle—viz., that productive labour not clashing with property creates property—a writer or his paymaster acquires the sole right to print the new work for sale. All lawyers out of Bedlam go thus far with me.

By the second the proprietor acquires nothing at all; he merely retains for ever that sole right to print which he has acquired by productive labour—unless, indeed, he divests himself by "clear consent" or "long neglect," to be proved before a jury.

Transfer to another individual is "clear consent." To leave a printed book fifty years out of print might possibly be "delictum," or long neglect—if a jury should so decide—and that would make the right common. But to print and reprint one's own creation is to exercise the exclusive right, and exercise is the opposite of "delictum:" it is the very course the common law has prescribed from time immemorial to keep alive an exclusive right when once acquired.

So much for the governing principles. Now for their operation.

No French nor Dutch jurist disputes that intellectual property was the product of his national law, though afterwards regulated by statutes; and that alone is a reply to the metaphysical sophists who argue à priori that common law could not recognize a property so subtle. However, a little fact is worth a great deal of sophistical conjecture. So let us examine fact, and candidly. In England the early history of the property has to be read subject to a just caution; we must assign no judicial authority to unconstitutional tribunals, but only glean old facts from them, and that discreetly. From the infancy of printing till the year 1640, an Englishman could neither print his own book honestly nor his neighbour's dishonestly without a licence from the Crown. Its principal agent in this iron rule was the Star Chamber, a tribunal whose deeds and words are not worth the millionth of a straw judicially. But, as historical evidence, especially on any matter irrelevant to its vices, its records are as valuable to a modern as any other ancient official memoranda of current events. The original word for "copyright" was "copy," and the Star Chamber used this word in very early times. This proves a bare fact, that copyright existed of old in printed books, and that, under the Tudor Sovereigns, it was an antiquity; since it had even then lived long enough to take the technical name "copy," whereas literary monopolies granted by the Crown were invariably and with just discrimination called "patents;" and "stage-right," whose existence (in unprinted dramas) by common law, at this time, is not doubted by any English lawyer, had no name at all, direct nor roundabout.

The Stationers' Company was first chartered in 1556. In 1558 they enter copyrights under the names of their proprietors, and the entries continue in an unbroken series until 1875. In 1582 there are entries with this proviso, that the Crown licence to print should be void, if it be found that the copyright belonged to another person. This shows how Englishmen, when not corrupted by pettifoggers, gravitate towards law and the sanctity of property. The Stationers'

Company was chartered by the Crown, and invested with some unconstitutional powers; yet in a very few years they make the Royal licence bow to a precedent title of proprietorship, that could in 1582 have no foundation but in common law.

In 1640 the Star Chamber was abolished, and for a while everybody printed what he liked; thereupon, as free opinions differ, some wrote against the Parliament. Straight the two Houses of Parliament took a leaf out of the book of Kings, and passed an ordinance forbidding any work to be printed without a formal licence; and then, as pirates, relieved of the licenser, had begun their game, the same ordinance forbade printing without the consent of the owner of the copyright, on pain of forfeiture of the books to the owner of the copyright. Thus the Commonwealth, in protecting copyright, went a step beyond the monarchical Governments that preceded it: which please make a note of, Brother Jonathan.

November, 1644, Milton published his famous defence of unlicensed printing, and attacked that portion of the aforesaid ordinance, which infringed common-law liberties; but he sanctioned very solemnly that portion which protected common-law rights. That great enthusiast for just liberty used these words, "the just retaining of each man his several 'copy' (copyright), which God forbid should be gainsaid."

Anno 1662. Act 13 and 14 Charles II. prohibited printing any book without consent of the owner, upon pain of certain forfeitures, half to the King, half to the owner. This statute followed the wording of the Republican ordinance. I need hardly say that in any Act of Parliament "owner" means the "legal owner," not the claimant of an impossible or even doubtful right. Under this statute a leading case was tried, that might be entitled Property v. Monopoly. "Streater" held what our ancestors with a scientific precision their muddle-headed descendants have lost till this day called a "patent." He was law patentee, i.e. he had from the Crown a sole right to print law reports, and that, Messrs. Yates and Macaulay, was "a monopoly in books" if you like. Streater reprinted Judge Croke's reports. Roper sued Streater, proving his own legal ownership by purchase of Croke's copyright from Croke's executor. Roper's title was at common law, for the statute of Charles II. never pretended to confer ownership; it only protected the existing legal owner by special remedies. Streater (Monopoly) pleaded the King's grant; Roper (Property) demurred. This brought the question of law before the full Court of Common Pleas. It was given for the plaintiff against the King, by judges who were removable at the will of the Sovereign, and more inclined to stretch a point for him than against him. Opposed to a Royal grant, had Roper's title at law been doubtful, they would have swept him out of court with a besom.

Successive licensing Acts protected the common-law owner of copyright until 1694, when the last Act expired; but as another was threatened for five years, a dread hung over piracy. This being removed in 1699, the pirates went to work with such fury that the proprietors of copyright began to cry out, and in 1703 petitioned Parliament for protection. For six weary years they besieged hard hearts and apathetic ears. One of the petitions survives, and therein the petitioners, though it was their interest to exaggerate their case, and say they had no remedy at law, do, on the contrary, admit there is a remedy at common law. But they say it is inadequate—that in an action on the case, the jury will give no more damages than can be proved, and how can a thousand piratical copies be traced all over the country? “Besides, the defendant is always a pauper,” &c. &c., cited from the journals of the House.

In 1709 the Legislature took pity on authors and honest publishers, and passed an Act, the words of which and their contemporaneous interpretation are necessarily the last great link in the history of copyright, before that creature of the common law became the nursling of statutes. The preamble of a statute is not law, but history: it relates antecedent facts, and declares the cause and motives of the enactment to follow. Instead of comments I put italics:—

“Whereas printers, booksellers, and others, have of late frequently taken the liberty of printing, reprinting, and publishing, books and other writings, without the consent of the authors, or proprietors, to their very great detriment, and too often to the ruin of them and their families—for preventing therefore such practices for the future, be it enacted”—8th Anne, cap. 19, sec. 1.

In the body of the Act thus prefaced, the old word “copy” for “copyright” is used six times in the sense it had been used for ages, and, so far from inventing even a new protection to old copyright, as dreamers fancy, the Act, in that respect also, is a servile imitation of the various licensing Acts. As the Monarchical licensing Acts, and the Republican ordinances, found owners and proprietors of “copy,” so this Act finds proprieters of "copy" and, as the Republican and Monarchical Acts, protected the existing owners or proprietors of "copy" by confiscation of the piratical books so this Act protects the existing proprieters of "copy" by confiscation of the piratical books; and, to any man with an eye in his mind, this deliberate imitation of preceding Acts, that had recognized "copyright" at common law, and protected it by penalties, is not only a recognition of the property, but a recognition of the recognitions and the penalties. Dreamers always confound dates; they forget that many of the Parliament men A.D. 1709 had themselves in person passed a licensing Act. Even the one apparent novelty—the curtailing clause—was a bungling attempt to arrive in another way at the temporary feature, which was the characteristic of the licensing Acts. The bill, we know, went into Committee an Act protecting property for ever by penalties. In Committee it encountered old members, and these, with a servile double imitation of the licensing Acts, which were penal, and only passed for a term, fixed an imitation term to the imitation penalties, but so unskilfully that, by the grammatical sense of their words, they shortened the days of the sacred everlasting property itself. Subject to a saving clause, which afterwards proved too obscure and feeble to combat the spoliation clause, they fixed a term—of a book already printed, twenty-one years; of a book to be printed, fourteen years; but fourteen more should the author survive the first term.

Such to a reader of this day, when the application of the lying term "monopoly" has blunted the understanding and the conscience, is the apparent sense of the statute. But you must remember that in 1709 the word "monopoly" had never been applied to "copyright" by any human creature: and so rooted was all common-law property, and the sense of its inviolability, in the English mind, that neither the laymen nor the lawyers of Queen Anne's generation read the statute as curtailing the sacred property. Honest Englishmen, not blinded by cant, know no difference of sanctity in property. From a hovel to a palace it is equally sacred. Curtailment of an Englishman's property is spoliation in futuro, and spoliation, without a full equivalent, is a public felony Englishmen were slow to suspect the State of. Queen Anne's Parliament sat at Westminster, not Newgate; and therefore the curtailing clauses were interpreted to apply to the new penalties, not to a thing so inviolable as the ancient property. Authors continued, after this statute, to assign their copyright for ever and publishers to purchase them for ever, just as they did before the statute; and, for forty years at least, while the contemporaneous exposition of the statute was still warm, equity judges, who had conversed with members of both Houses that passed the Act, and with lawyers who had framed it, and had means of knowing the mind of Parliament that we can never have, granted relief by injunction to several plaintiffs, who by the lapse of time had no legal claim to any benefit from the statute, but only from the precedent common-law right.

In 1769—Millar v. Taylor—the judges of the King's Bench, by a majority of three to one, decided that Queen Anne's statute had not curtailed the ancient right, but, like its models, the licensing Acts, had supported it by penalties, which expired in a few years, leaving the bare right protected only by action upon the case, as it was before the statute.

This decision stood for five years. But all those five years the lying word "monopoly," launched by the dissentient judge in Millar v. Taylor, was undermining the property.

February 9, 1774, on an appeal from the Court of Chancery in Donaldson v. Becket, the House of Peers directed the judges at common law to reply to three questions, which may be thus condensed:—

1. Had an author the sole right at common law to print his MS.?

2. If so, did he lose his exclusive right by printing?

3. Did the statute of Queen Anne curtail this right, and confine it entirely to the times and other conditions specified?

On the first question the judges, including Lord Mansfield, were nine to three, on the second, eight to four against the forfeiture, and on the third, six to six.

But Lord Mansfield, whose great learning left little room in his mind for so small a trait as pluck, withheld his voice, without changing his mind, and made the numbers appear to be—on the first question eight to three, on the second seven to four, on the third six to five. Pursuing the same delicate course in the House of Peers itself, he sacrificed the biggest thing on earth, and that is justice, to an extremely pretty, put small, thing, etiquette; whereas Lord Camden, who for known reasons hated authors, and hated Lord Mansfield, laid aside not only etiquette, but judicial gravity, and ranted and canted?

without disguise, as counsel for the pirates, and so stole a majority (of lay lords, not lawyers), whose judgment, however, went only to this, that the statute had curtailed the everlasting common-law right.

Thus these lucky knaves, the pirates, got a sham majority of the judges to defy the contemporaneous and continued interpretation of a statute sixty years old—a malpractice without precedent in our courts—and—anomaly upon anomaly—to curtail so sacred a thing as an Englishman's property. Unfortunately their good luck did not stop there; though they were defeated upon the first and second questions, yet the Anglo-Saxon muddlehead now interprets their bastard victory on the first question, into a victory on the second question, where they were overpowered by numbers, and crushed by weight, Mansfield and Blackstone being in the majority, and in the minority three comic judges, Eyre, Perrot, and Adams, who held in the teeth of all the cases that an author has not, by common law, the sole right to print his own manuscript. Now the metaphysical muddleheads, led by Yates, had the same contempt for these three comic judges, their allies, that Mansfield and Blackstone had for their allies and them. So then the majority who said—"No, copyright at common law is not forfeited by its lawful exercise," for law abhors forfeiture—were agreed in principle: but the minority were only agreed to say, "Copyright in printed books did not exist at common law." They could not agree why. The only principle the metaphysical judges, and the comic judges, held in common, was "a labefaction of all principle," viz. a resolution to outlaw authors per fas et nefas. But the Anglo-Saxon addlepate, unable to observe, and therefore unable to discriminate, contemplates, with his mooning, lacklustre eye, a consistent majority, led by the only judges Europe recognised as jurists, and a minority, composed of trumpery little obscure judges at war with each other; and, in the teeth of this treble majority, by numbers, weight, and unanimity, says copyright was declared by the judges a creature of statutes.

Not so, my friend and jackass. A great majority of the judges, led by giants, and agreeing in principle, overpowered a small and discordant minority of judicial dwarfs, and declared copyright in printed books a creature of the common law, and a nursling of statutes.

Looking at the conduct of its first nurse, in 1709, the latter term is doubly appropriate; for, when a nurse is not the mother, she is the very woman to overlie the bantling, and shorten its days.

Thus from 1700-1709, authors and their assignees suffered such lawless devastation of their property and undeserved ruin as no other citizens ever endured at that epoch of civilization; and in 1774 the same favourite victims of injustice suffered two such wrongs, judicial and legislative, as would, had they fallen on any powerful class of citizens, have drenched the land in blood, have set the outlawed proprietors killing pirates like rats, and imperilled the House of Lords, both as a tribunal and a branch of the Legislature. And this is the right way to measure public crimes; for, though it is safer to trample unjustly on the worthy and the weak than on the strong, it is not a bit more just, and it is not so much more expedient as it looks; for every dog gets his day.

The judicial wrong.—The judges are the constitutional interpreters of statutes, and their interpretations are law. Precedent rules our courts like iron. When judges, who sit near the time of an Act, interpret it in open court by judgments, and so precedents of interpretation accumulate, the chain of practical interpretations becomes law, and immutable; especially if the Act so interpreted came after a right at common law and recognized it. Never, since England was a nation, has sixty years' interpretation of a statute been upset, except to injure authors. Sixty years' interpretation of Queen Anne's statute, had the interpretation been injurious to authors, would have stood as immovable as the walls of Westminster Hall. Not one English judge would have listened either to reason, or to principle, or to grammar, or to all three, against a chain of precedents, had those precedents been injurious to authors. Every lawyer knows this is so, and that the answer of the judges to an innovating author would have been, "We do not make interpretations of old statutes; we find them in the cases. Have you a case, Mr. Author?"

The House of Lords was not itself in this matter. Besides the excess of lay peers, there were two elements that vitiated its judgment. 1st. Lord Mansfield withheld his vote. That was monstrous. In the tribunal whence there is no appeal, if the most capable judge withholds his voice, the majority is a delusion. I don't say his silence was without precedent. But the other side flung precedent to the winds. 2nd. Lord

Camden, one of the judges, was corrupt. A man may be corrupted with other things than bribes. This lawyer was corrupted by his passions. He hated authors for blackballing him at their club, and he hated Lord Mansfield for being a greater lawyer than himself. Lord Mansfield was silent, yet Camden spoke at him all through; and he spoke on the judgment-seat, not as judges speak who are trying to be just, but as counsel play with claptrap on the prejudices of a jury—and what were the lay lords but a jury! He, who had never worked his brain for reputation only, but also for money, money for pleading causes, money for doing justice on the Bench, pension-money for having judged cases and been paid at the time, he had the egotism and the impudence to urge that “Glory is the sole reward of authors, and those who desire it scorn all meaner views. Away, then,” says canting Camden, “with the illiberal avarice that, at sixty or seventy years of age, still seeks a return from books written at thirty or forty. No, let the aged author take his tottering limbs and his grey hairs to an almshouse or starvation; I’m all right: I’ve got a pension.” With such justice, such unselfishness, such humanity as this, well wrapt in rant and omnipotent cant, he bribed Lord Noodle and Lord Doodle—judges in virtue of their titles—to annul a chain of true judicial precedents, to pillage the property of their intellectual superiors, and doom their declining days to poverty and degradation. Why not? The villainy could not recoil on any one of the perpetrators: the lay judges had all got land from their sires, a property, the title to which is generally impure, but it cannot be curtailed, and the pensioned pettifogger was kept in affluence by the State he no longer worked for; that State, which does not pension retired authors, and therefore was all the more bound to secure to their old age the property—for creating which they receive neither salaries nor pensions—against pilfering pirates, metaphysical muddleheads, romantic pettifoggers, canting pensioners, and all the other egotists, dunces, and knaves, who, possessing the lower intellect, hate the highest intellect, and grudge it a long lease of its own poor, little, insufficient freehold, held by ten thousand times the purest title law can find on sea or land—Creation.

The legislatorial wrong.—The nation cried shame at the judicial robbery of authors and their assigns. The House of Commons which is the representative of the country in Parliament, wasted no time, but proceeded to cure the wrong by fresh legislation. They brought in a bill restoring the common-law right apart from the statutory penalties. It was carried by a large majority. But in the Upper House it encountered Lord Camden. To be sure, matters were changed now: justice and humanity no longer asked him to resign his new, but grammatical, interpretation of an old statute. They bowed to his new interpretation, and merely asked him to legislate accordingly: to rectify the unhappy misunderstanding by a fairer and more humane enactment. No! the cruel legislator retained the perverse malignity of the passionate judge; he met all the petitions of the sufferers, and all the assignments for ever of literary property, that had been made in good faith, with a falsehood—that copyright is a monopoly—and with the same rant and cant he had defiled the judgment-seat with in Donaldson v. Becket. He wrought upon the passions and the illiterate prejudices of a House, which was not the enlightened assembly it is now; justice in the person of Lord Mansfield once more sat mumchance, apathetic, cowardly, dumb, despising secretly the romantic injustice, the pseudo-metaphysical idiocy, the rant and cant, and misplaced malevolence, he should have got up and throttled, like a man; unfortunate authors!—the foibles of your friends, the vices of your enemies, all tended by some gravitation of injustice to weigh down the habitual victims; and so a small majority of the peers was got to overpower a large majority of the Commons, and the sense and humanity of the nation.

Upon this, authors and honest publishers fell into deep dejection, and resigned all hope of justice during their enemy's lifetime. After his death the House of Peers became more human; they seemed to admit, with tardy regret, that Lord Camden had misled them, a little; that an author, after all, was not an old wild beast, but an old man; and so they gave him back his stolen property for his whole life, and for twenty-eight years at least.

That remorse did not decline, but grew as civilization advanced. In 1842, Parliament, advised by lawyers worthy of the name, passed a nobler bill. They gave the lie direct to Mr. Justice Yates and Lord Camden, by formally declaring copyright to be property (Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 45, sect. 25), and they postponed the statutory dissolution of this sacred and declared property for forty-two years at least, and seven years after the author's death.

But for Macaulay's rhetoric, and his popular cry "Monopoly," Parliament would have refunded us our property for sixty years: and that may come as civilization and sound views of law advance. For, in this more enlightened century, the progress of intellectual property keeps step with advancing civilization and sound views of trade. Accordingly in 1838, there was a faint attempt at international justice to authors, and in 1851, other nations began really to comprehend what France, the leading nation in this morality, had always seen, that the nationality of an author does not affect his moral claim to a property in his composition. But that question includes international stage-right, and must follow its legal history; which, however, will not detain us long from the main topic of these letters.

CHARLES READE.

FOURTH LETTER.

SIR,—Stage-right is a term invented by me, and first printed in a book called "The Eighth Commandment." The judges of the Common Pleas accepted it from me when I argued in person the question of law, that arose out of the first count in Reade v. Conquest. The term was necessary. Truth and legal science had not a fair chance, so long as the fallacious phrase "Dramatic Copyright" infested the courts and the books: its use, by counsel and judges, had created many misunderstandings, and one judicial error, Cumberland v. Planché. Language has its laws, which even the learned cannot violate with impunity: adjectives can qualify a substantive, but cannot change its substance; "Dramatic Copyright" either means the exclusive right of printing a play-book, or it means nothing: but, since the word "Copyright" covers the exclusive right of printing a play-book, "Dramatic Copyright" does really mean nothing. It is an illogical, pernicious phrase, and, if any lawyer will just substitute the word "Stage-right," he will be amazed at the flood of light the mere use of a scientific word will pour upon the fog, that at present envelops history and old decisions, especially Col man v. Wathen, Murray v. Elliston, and Morris v. Kelly, leading cases.

Stage-right, or the sole right of an author to produce and reproduce his unprinted dramas on the stage, is allowed by lawyers to have been a common-law right up to the date of 3 Will. IV. This admission shortens discussion. Henslowe's Theatre was exceptional: in his days and Shakespeare's, most theatres were managed thus: established actors were the shareholders, and obtained plays on various terms; if an author was a member of the sharing company, he was paid by his share of the profits. The non-sharing author received a sum, or the overplus of a certain night, or both. The stage-right of an author vested in the company upon the common-law principle, that the paymaster of a production is its proprietor. To this severe equity we owe a literary misfortune; several hundred plays, many of them masterpieces, were kept out of print, and have been lost. The plays of Jonson, Fletcher, Shakespeare, and others, were confined to the theatre until well worn. Messrs. Pope, Warburton, and Jonson, had not the key to Shakespeare's business, and wrote wildly—that he neglected his reputation, did not think his works worth printing, and, thanks to his flightiness, his lines come down to us more corrupt than the text of Velleius Paterculus: but the truth is, other plays were kept out of print as long as his were, and his text is by no means the only corrupt one of that day; and what those finefellows call his flightiness was good sense and probity. He valued reputation, as all writers do. But he valued it at its value. The man wrote poems as well as plays, and did the best thing possible with both: of a poem the road to a little fame and profit was the printing press; of a play the way to great fame and profit was the theatre; readers were very few, playgoers numerous beyond belief; observe, then, his good sense—he prints his poems in 1594, almost as soon as he can afford to do it: of his plays he prints a few, one at a time, and never till each play has been well worn in the theatre. Observe his probity; he was a sharing author, and his fellow shareholders had an equitable lien on his plays. To gratify his vanity by wholesale publication of his plays would have been unfair to them. This is connected with my subject thus—In his will, particular as it is, he did not bequeath his plays to anyone. Therefore, primâ facie they would go to his residuary legatee. But they did not go to her. Created by a shareholder in the Globe, and handsomely paid for year by year, they remained, by current equity, the property of the theatre. The shareholders kept them to the boards for seven years after his death, and then printed them. His first editors, Hemming and Condell, had been his joint shareholders in the Globe. Now observe how the men of that day commented by anticipation on the romantic cant of recent pettifoggers, that centuries ago if anyone printed a MS., he resigned all the rights he held while it was in MS. ! The copyright in Shakespeare's plays—it was not violated at all. The stage-right—it was not violated for some years after the plays were printed ; but, as printing and publishing plays facilitate dramatic piracy, though they do not make it honest, some companies plucked up courage in 1627, and began to perform Shakespeare's dramas from the printed book. Then the holders of the stage-right went to the licenser of plays, and he stopped the company of the Red Bull Theatre in that act of piracy. See "Collier's Annals of the Stage," vol. ii. p. 8. The Chamberlain's decision, in this matter, is of no legal value ; but it shows historically that the moral sense and equity, which in the present day govern stage-right and copyright, were not invented by recent Parliaments ; and the proof is accumulative, for ten years later—namely, in 1637—another Chamberlain is found acting on the same equity, and in terms worth noting. On application from the shareholders of the Cockpit in Drury-lane, the Chamberlain gave solemn notice to other companies not to represent certain plays, twenty-four in number, which "did all and every of them properly, and of right, belong to that company," and he "requires all masters and governors of playhouses, and all others whom it concerns, to take notice and forbear to impeach the said William Bieston (who represented the shareholders of the Cockpit) in the premises." Of these twenty-four plays some were in MS., and some printed. The notice is worded by a lawyer, and the declared object is to protect property. Malone in Prolegomena to Shakespeare, vol. iii., p. 158.

Soon after this the theatres were closed ; and that made the readers of plays a hundred, where one had been, and deranged for ever the equitable custom that prevailed before the Civil War. As soon as the theatre reopened, dramatists made other and better terms, and those terms were uniform ; they never sold their manuscripts out and out to the theatre ; from 1662 to 1694 they divided their stage-right from their copyright ; they took from the theatre the overplus of the third night, generally at double prices, and they always sold the copyright to the booksellers. Testibus Downes, Pepys, Malone, Collier, and many others.

The following figures can be relied on :—Stage-right.—In 1694 Southerne obtained another night, the sixth. In 1705 Farquhar obtained a third night, the ninth, and authors held these three nights about a century. Dryden, under the one-night system, used to receive for stage-right about £100, and for copyright £20—£25. But his plays were not very popular. Southerne, for “The Fatal Marriage,” A.D. 1694, stage-right two nights’ overplus, £260, copyright £36. Rowe’s “Jane Shore,” stage-right three nights, copyright £50 15s. Rowe’s “Jane Grey,” stage-right three nights, copyright £75. Southerne’s “Spartan Dame,” stage-right not known, copyright £120, A.D. 1719. Cibber’s “Non-Juror” and Smythe’s “Rival Modes,” stage-right three nights each, copyright a hundred guineas apiece from Bookseller Lintot. Fenton’s “Marianne,” stage-right and copyright, total £1,000, A.D. 1723. “George Barnwell,” by Lillo, stage-right the overplus of three nights, copyright £105. This copyright Lillo assigned to Bookseller Gray and his heirs for ever, on the 25th of November, 1735. The assignment is to be seen to this day, printed in full, in the edition of 1810. Dr. Young’s “Busiris,” stage-right three nights, copyright £84. Lintot. Copyright alone of Addison’s “Drummer” (failed at the time on stage), £50. Dr. Young’s “Revenge,” stage-right large, copyright £50. “Beggar’s Opera,” stage-right £1,600, copyright £400. “Polly,” by the same author, representation stopped by the Chamberlain, copyright £1,200. This proves little; it was published by subscription. “The Brothers,” by Dr. Young, stage-right and copyright £1,000, the proportions not ascertained. “The Follies of a Day,” by Holcroft, stage-right £600, copyright £300. “Road to Ruin,” stage-right £900, copyright £400. Goldsmith’s “Good-natured Man,” stage-right £300, copyright £200. “She Stoops to Conquer,” stage-right £500, copyright £300.

Now the other branch of fiction had but one market, copyright: yet the copyright of a story in prose or verse was less valuable than the copyright of a play. Milton’s “Paradise Lost” was sold in 1657 for £5 per edition, which was rather less than the copyright of a play in 1662, and 80 per cent. less than the stage-right. Defoe did not receive £105 for

"Robinson Crusoe." Pope's "Rape of the Lock," first edition, £7. Second edition, £15. Dr. Johnson's "Irene," a very bad play, brought him £315. "Rasselas," an exquisite tale, only £100; and his true narratives, and best work, "The Lives of the Poets," only £200. Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" only £60, which compare with the copyrights of Goldsmith's plays; that were nevertheless less remunerative than his stage-rights. Of the two properties in a play, both so largely remunerated, neither could have been an empty sound; book-copyright, far less valuable, was, we know, secure; nor is it credible that the stage-right was legally dissolved, if the author went into print: otherwise, the managers would have objected to the dramatist going into print, and the managers were clearly masters of the situation.

Macklin v. Richardson—A.D. 1770. Macklin, author of a MS. farce, used to play it, but never printed. Richardson took it down shorthand from the actor's lips, and printed it. Macklin filed an injunction. Defendant tried the reasoning of Mr. Justice Yates: "Plaintiff had flown his bird; had given his ideas to the public, and no member of the public could be restrained from doing what he liked with them." This piece of thieves' cant failed, and the injunction was made perpetual. This is a pure copy-right case; stage-right never entered the discussion. Coleman v. Wathen, and Murray v. Elliston, were neither copyright, nor stage-right, but bastard cases, where the wrong plaintiff came into court. They arose out of an imperfect vocabulary. "Words are the counters of wise men, but the money of fools," says Lord Bacon: the sole right of printing being represented by a good hard substantive, any mind could realize that right, but the sole right of representation not being represented by a substantive, the soft heads of little lawyers could not realize its distinct existence and heterogeneous character. One has only to supply the substantive, stage-right, and the fog flies.

Coleman v. Wathen.—O'Keefe wrote a play; by this act he created two properties assignable to distinct traders—a common-law right, stage-right; and a statutory right, copyright. He assigned the copyright to Coleman in terms that could not possibly convey the stage-right. Wathen played the play piratically at Richmond. This was an infraction of O'Keefe's stage-right, but not of Coleman's copyright: yet bad legal advisers sent not O'Keefe, but Coleman, into court as plaintiff.

Coleman produced in court an assignment of copyright, and sued under the Act of Parliament for breach of it: but that statutory right had never been infringed. As for the stage-right, it never came into court at all; it stayed outside with O'Keefe and the common-law.

Murray v. Elliston.—The same error. Lord Byron, by writing "Sardanapalus," created stage-right at common-law, and copyright by statute. He assigned the copyright to Murray. He could have assigned the stage-right to Morris. By not assigning it to anybody he retained it. "Expressum facit cessare tacitum." Elliston played "Sardanapalus." If Murray had been well advised, he would have sent off a courier to Lord Byron, and obtained an assignment of the common-law right of representation. Instead of that, this assignee of the copyright went to Eldon, and asked him to restrain a piracy upon the author's stage-right, which was actually at that moment the author's property and not Murray's. Now it is sworn in the Blue-book of 1832 that Lord Eldon never refused an injunction to a manager, who had purchased a stage-right. But of course when not a manager, but a publisher, the assignee of a statutory copyright, came to him to restrain an infringement of common-law stage-right, he declined to interfere, and sent the plaintiff to Westminster. The judges decided against this plaintiff, but did not give their reasons. That is very unusual; but how could they give their reasons? The poor dear souls had not got the words to explain with. Existing language was a mere trap. They had got one word for two distinct properties: so they very very wisely avoided their vehicle of confusion, language, and acted the just distinction they could not speak for want of a substantive. There is no reason to suppose that they would have denied the title of a theatrical manager armed with an assignment of the stage-right in "Sardanapalus." There was a side question of abridgment in Murray v. Elliston, but that was for a jury. The judges had nothing to do with that: what they denied was Murray's right to bring an action; and they were right: he was no more the plaintiff than my grandmother was.

Morris v. Kelly.—This is the only stage-right case in the books. Morris, manager of the Haymarket Theatre, was not a dealer in copyrights, but stage-rights. He produced, not an assignment of O'Keefe's copyright, as Coleman had done, but good prima facie evidence that he had purchased O'Keefe's stage-right. The very same judge, who declined to assist the assignee of Byron's copyright in a case of piratical representation, granted an injunction with downright alacrity when the assignee of O'Keefe's stage-right stood before him. The play, whose performance was thus restrained, had been in print ever so long. Therefore, the theory that under the common law stage-right exists in a MS., but expires if the play is printed, received no countenance from that learned and wary judge, Lord Eldon. I knew the plaintiff, Morris: he was a most respectable man; he has sworn before Parliament that Lord Eldon constantly granted injunctions in support of a manager's stage-right. Morris's evidence is incidentally confirmed by "Godson on Patents:" he mentions an injunction, Morris v. Harris, which is not reported.

The sworn deposition of Morris, and the support given to it by the two recorded cases, Morris v. Kelly, and the unreported case mentioned by Godson, would be meagre evidence, if opposed; but there is nothing at all to set against that evidence—not a case, not a dictum; and it accords with the prices of plays, play-books, and story-books in prose and verse, for 150 years, 1657—1810. Stage-right, therefore, in unprinted plays was, by admission, a creature of the common law and the natural product of common justice: the immense publicity given to the author's ideas by representation did not justify the public in carrying away the words to represent them in another theatre. Printing a play would greatly facilitate piracy: but the power to misappropriate is not the right to misappropriate. That printing a play could actually forfeit so heterogeneous a property as stage-right is a conjecture. What little evidence there is runs against the forfeiture. Up to the Commonwealth, the Chamberlain, alleging property, stopped violation of stage-right in plays, whether they were printed or not. After the Restoration we have only the evidence of prices for 150 years, and Lord Eldon's judgment. He protected stage-right after publication, and his is the only judicial decision that touches stage-right at common-law, either in MSS. or play-books.

If, therefore, we are to go by impartial principles of law and the best direct evidence we can get, and superior weight of judicial authority, speaking obiter in Donaldson v. Becket, and ad rem in Morris v. Kelly, stage-right in MSS., and even in printed plays, was like copyright, a creature of common sense, common justice, and common law; but, like copyright, is now a nursling of statutes, thanks to a sudden onslaught by pirates. For, if law be ever so clear, but carry no penalty for breach, property is the sport of accident; so, on the close of the war in 1815, monopoly and piracy fell upon the dramatist, and destroyed him. Two theatres got the sole right to play legitimate pieces in London, and this made the author their slave. They robbed him of his three nights' overplus, and threw him a few pounds for a drama worth thousands. As to the provincial theatres, a single pirate drove all the dramatists clean out of them. Here is a copy of his public advertisement—and please observe it is unprinted plays he pirates wholesale:—"Mr. Kenneth, at the corner of Bow Street, will supply any gentleman with any manuscript on the lowest terms"—and here is an example:—Mr. Douglas Jerrold gives evidence to the Parliamentary Commission, Blue-book, p. 156:—"The Rent Day" was played in the country a fortnight after it was produced at Drury Lane, and I have a letter in my pocket in which a provincial manager said he would willingly have given me £5 for a copy, had he not before paid £2 for it to some stranger" (meaning Kenneth). The method of this caitiff is revealed in another quarter. "Kenneth went to the theatre with a shorthand writer, who took the words down and the mise-en-scène. He had copyists ready at home to transcribe, and the stolen goods were on their way to the provincial theatres in a few hours." But the London theatres also pirated the author. Moncrieff deposed that he produced "Giovanni," a musical piece, at a minor theatre. Drury Lane, one of the two theatres that had a monopoly in legitimate pieces, sent into Surrey, stole this illegitimate piece, and played it in the teeth of the author. The manager made thousands by it, and brought out Madame Vestris in it, and she made thousands. It was only the poor author that was swindled for enriching both manager and actor. That victim of ten thousand wrongs dared not resist this piece of scoundrelism; the managers would have excluded him altogether from the market, narrowed by monopoly.

But piracy has also its indirect effects. Even honest people will not give much for a property they see others stealing. By "The Rent Day" the theatre cleared twenty thousand pounds; but the author only £150; and for "Black-eyed Susan," which saved Manager Elliston from bankruptcy and made him flourish like a green bay-tree, the

But for Macaulay's rhetoric, and his popular cry "Monopoly," Parliament would have refunded us our property for sixty years: and that may come as civilization and sound views of law advance. For, in this more enlightened century, the progress of intellectual property keeps step with advancing civilization and sound views of trade. Accordingly in 1838, there was a faint attempt at international justice to authors, and in 1851, other nations began really to comprehend what France, the leading nation in this morality, had always seen, that the nationality of an author does not affect his moral claim to a property in his composition. But that question includes international stage-right, and must follow its legal history; which, however, will not detain us long from the main topic of these letters.

SIR,—Stage-right is a term invented by me, and first printed in a book called "The Eighth Commandment." The judges of the Common Pleas accepted it from me when I argued in person the question of law, that arose out of the first count in Reade v. Conquest. The term was necessary. Truth and legal science had not a fair chance, so long as the fallacious phrase "Dramatic Copyright" infested the courts and the books: its use, by counsel and judges, had created many misunderstandings, and one judicial error, Cumberland v. Planché. Language has its laws, which even the learned cannot violate with impunity: adjectives can qualify a substantive, but cannot change its substance; "Dramatic Copyright" either means the exclusive right of printing a play-book, or it means nothing: but, since the word "Copyright" covers the exclusive right of printing a play-book, "Dramatic Copyright" does really mean nothing. It is an illogical, pernicious phrase, and, if any lawyer will just substitute the word "Stage-right," he will be amazed at the flood of light the mere use of a scientific word will pour upon the fog, that at present envelops history and old decisions, especially Cole man v. Wathen, Murray v. Elliston, and Morris v. Kelly, leading cases.

Stage-right, or the sole right of an author to produce and reproduce his unprinted dramas on the stage, is allowed by lawyers to have been a common-law right up to the date of 3 Will. IV. This admission shortens discussion. Henslowe's Theatre was exceptional: in his days and Shakespeare's, most theatres were managed thus: established actors were the shareholders, and obtained plays on various terms; if an author was a member of the sharing company, he was paid by his share of the profits. The non-sharing author received a sum, or the overplus of a certain night, or both. The stage-right of an author vested in the company upon the common-law principle, that the paymaster of a production is its proprietor. To this severe equity we owe a literary misfortune; several hundred plays, many of them masterpieces, were kept out of print, and have been lost. The plays of Jonson, Fletcher, Shakespeare, and others, were confined to the theatre until well worn. Messrs. Pope, Warburton, and Jonson, had not the key to Shakespeare's business, and wrote wildly—that he neglected his reputation, did not think his works worth printing, and, thanks to his flightiness, his lines come down to us more corrupt than the text of Velleius Paterculus: but the truth is, other plays were kept out of print as long as his were, and his text is by no means the only corrupt one of that day; and what those fine fellows call his flightiness was good sense and probity. He valued reputation, as all writers do. But he valued it at its value. The man wrote poems as well as plays, and did the best thing possible with both: of a poem the road to a little fame and profit was the printing press; of a play the way to great fame and profit was the theatre; readers were very few, playgoers numerous beyond belief; observe, then, his good sense—he prints his poems in 1594, almost as soon as he can afford to do it: of his plays he prints a few, one at a time, and never till each play has been well worn in the theatre. Observe his probity; he was a sharing author, and his fellow shareholders had an equitable lien on his plays. To gratify his vanity by wholesale publication of his plays would have been unfair to them. This is connected with my subject thus—In his will, particular as it is, he did not bequeath his plays to anyone. Therefore, primâ facie they would go to his residuary legatee. But they did not go to her. Created by a shareholder in the Globe, and handsomely paid for year by year, they remained, by current equity, the property of the theatre. The shareholders kept them to the boards for seven years after his death, and then printed them. His first editors, Hemming and Condell, had been his joint shareholders in the Globe. Now observe how the men of that day commented by anticipation on the romantic cant of recent pettifoggers, that centuries ago if anyone printed a MS., he resigned all the rights he held while it was in MS. ! The copyright in Shakespeare's plays—it was not violated at all. The stage-right—it was not violated for some years after the plays were printed ; but, as printing and publishing plays facilitate dramatic piracy, though they do not make it honest, some companies plucked up courage in 1627, and began to perform Shakespeare's dramas from the printed book. Then the holders of the stage-right went to the licenser of plays, and he stopped the company of the Red Bull Theatre in that act of piracy. See "Collier's Annals of the Stage," vol. ii. p. 8. The Chamberlain's decision, in this matter, is of no legal value ; but it shows historically that the moral sense and equity, which in the present day govern stage-right and copyright, were not invented by recent Parliaments ; and the proof is accumulative, for ten years later—namely, in 1637—another Chamberlain is found acting on the same equity, and in terms worth noting. On application from the shareholders of the Cockpit in Drury-lane, the Chamberlain gave solemn notice to other companies not to represent certain plays, twenty-four in number, which "did all and every of them properly, and of right, belong to that company," and he "requires all masters and governors of playhouses, and all others whom it concerns, to take notice and forbear to impeach the said William Bieston (who represented the shareholders of the Cockpit) in the premises." Of these twenty-four plays some were in MS., and some printed. The notice is worded by a lawyer, and the declared object is to protect property. Malone in Prolegomena to Shakespeare, vol. iii., p. 158.

Soon after this the theatres were closed ; and that made the readers of plays a hundred, where one had been, and deranged for ever the equitable custom that prevailed before the Civil War. As soon as the theatre reopened, dramatists made other and better terms, and those terms were uniform ; they never sold their manuscripts out and out to the theatre ; from 1662 to 1694 they divided their stage-right from their copyright ; they took from the theatre the overplus of the third night, generally at double prices, and they always sold the copyright to the booksellers. Testibus Downes, Pepys, Malone, Collier, and many others.

The following figures can be relied on:—Stage-right.—In 1694 Southerne obtained another night, the sixth. In 1705 Farquhar obtained a third night, the ninth, and authors held these three nights about a century. Dryden, under the one-night system, used to receive for stage-right about £100, and for copyright £20—£25. But his plays were not very popular. Southerne, for “The Fatal Marriage,” A.D. 1694, stage-right two nights’ overplus, £260, copyright £36. Rowe’s “Jane Shore,” stage-right three nights, copyright £50 15s. Rowe’s “Jane Grey,” stage-right three nights, copyright £75. Southerne’s “Spartan Dame,” stage-right not known, copyright £120, A.D. 1719. Cibber’s “Non-Juror” and Smythe’s “Rival Modes,” stage-right three nights each, copyright a hundred guineas apiece from Bookseller Lintot. Fenton’s “Marianne,” stage-right and copyright, total £1,000, A.D. 1723. “George Barnwell,” by Lillo, stage-right the overplus of three nights, copyright £105. This copyright Lillo assigned to Bookseller Gray and his heirs for ever, on the 25th of November, 1735. The assignment is to be seen to this day, printed in full, in the edition of 1810. Dr. Young’s “Busiris,” stage-right three nights, copyright £84. Lintot. Copyright alone of Addison’s “Drummer” (failed at the time on stage), £50. Dr. Young’s “Revenge,” stage-right large, copyright £50. “Beggar’s Opera,” stage-right £1,600, copyright £400. “Polly,” by the same author, representation stopped by the Chamberlain, copyright £1,200. This proves little; it was published by subscription. “The Brothers,” by Dr. Young, stage-right and copyright £1,000, the proportions not ascertained. “The Follies of a Day,” by Holcroft, stage-right £600, copyright £300. “Road to Ruin,” stage-right £900, copyright £400. Goldsmith’s “Good-natured Man,” stage-right £300, copyright £200. “She Stoops to Conquer,” stage-right £500, copyright £300.

Now the other branch of fiction had but one market, copyright: yet the copyright of a story in prose or verse was less valuable than the copyright of a play. Milton’s “Paradise Lost” was sold in 1657 for £5 per edition, which was rather less than the copyright of a play in 1662, and 80 per cent. less than the stage-right. Defoe did not receive £105 for

Camden, one of the judges, was corrupt. A man may be corrupted with other things than bribes. This lawyer was corrupted by his passions. He hated authors for blackballing him at their club, and he hated Lord Mansfield for being a greater lawyer than himself. Lord Mansfield was silent, yet Camden spoke at him all through; and he spoke on the judgment-seat, not as judges speak who are trying to be just, but as counsel play with claptrap on the prejudices of a jury—and what were the lay lords but a jury! He, who had never worked his brain for reputation only, but also for money, money for pleading causes, money for doing justice on the Bench, pension-money for having judged cases and been paid at the time, he had the egotism and the impudence to urge that “Glory is the sole reward of authors, and those who desire it scorn all meaner views. Away, then,” says canting Camden, “with the illiberal avarice that, at sixty or seventy years of age, still seeks a return from books written at thirty or forty. No, let the aged author take his tottering limbs and his grey hairs to an almshouse or starvation; I’m all right: I’ve got a pension.” With such justice, such unselfishness, such humanity as this, well wrapt in rant and omnipotent cant, he bribed Lord Noodle and Lord Doodle—judges in virtue of their titles—to annul a chain of true judicial precedents, to pillage the property of their intellectual superiors, and doom their declining days to poverty and degradation. Why not? The villainy could not recoil on any one of the perpetrators: the lay judges had all got land from their sires, a property, the title to which is generally impure, but it cannot be curtailed, and the pensioned pettifogger was kept in affluence by the State he no longer worked for; that State, which does not pension retired authors, and therefore was all the more bound to secure to their old age the property—for creating which they receive neither salaries nor pensions—against pilfering pirates, metaphysical muddleheads, romantic pettifoggers, canting pensioners, and all the other egotists, dunces, and knaves, who, possessing the lower intellect, hate the highest intellect, and grudge it a long lease of its own poor, little, insufficient freehold, held by ten thousand times the purest title law can find on sea or land—Creation.

The legislative wrong.—The nation cried shame at the judicial robbery of authors and their assigns. The House of Commons which is the representative of the country in Parliament, wasted no time, but proceeded to cure the wrong by fresh legislation. They brought in a bill restoring the common-law right apart from the statutory penalties. It was carried by a large majority. But in the Upper House it encountered Lord Camden. To be sure, matters were changed now: justice and humanity no longer asked him to resign his new, but grammatical, interpretation of an old statute. They bowed to his new interpretation, and merely asked him to legislate accordingly: to rectify the unhappy misunderstanding by a fairer and more humane enactment. No! the cruel legislator retained the perverse malignity of the passionate judge; he met all the petitions of the sufferers, and all the assignments for ever of literary property, that had been made in good faith, with a falsehood—that copyright is a monopoly—and with the same rant and cant he had defiled the judgment-seat with in Donaldson v. Becket. He wrought upon the passions and the illiterate prejudices of a House, which was not the enlightened assembly it is now; justice in the person of Lord Mansfield once more sat mumchance, apathetic, cowardly, dumb, despising secretly the romantic injustice, the pseudo-metaphysical idiocy, the rant and cant, and misplaced malevolence, he should have got up and throttled, like a man; unfortunate authors!—the foibles of your friends, the vices of your enemies, all tended by some gravitation of injustice to weigh down the habitual victims; and so a small majority of the peers was got to overpower a large majority of the Commons, and the sense and humanity of the nation.

Upon this, authors and honest publishers fell into deep dejection, and resigned all hope of justice during their enemy's lifetime. After his death the House of Peers became more human; they seemed to admit, with tardy regret, that Lord Camden had misled them, a little; that an author, after all, was not an old wild beast, but an old man; and so they gave him back his stolen property for his whole life, and for twenty-eight years at least.

That remorse did not decline, but grew as civilization advanced. In 1842, Parliament, advised by lawyers worthy of the name, passed a nobler bill. They gave the lie direct to Mr. Justice Yates and Lord Camden, by formally declaring copyright to be property (Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 45, sect. 25), and they postponed the statutory dissolution of this sacred and declared property for forty-two years at least, and seven years after the author's death.

Milton's "Paradise Lost" was sold in 1657 for £5 per edition, which was rather less than the copyright of a play in 1662, and 80 per cent. less than the stage-right. Defoe did not receive £105 for

"Robinson Crusoe." Pope's "Rape of the Lock," first edition, £7. Second edition, £15. Dr. Johnson's "Irene," a very bad play, brought him £315. "Rasselas," an exquisite tale, only £100; and his true narratives, and best work, "The Lives of the Poets," only £200. Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" only £60, which compare with the copyrights of Goldsmith's plays; that were nevertheless less remunerative than his stage-rights. Of the two properties in a play, both so largely remunerated, neither could have been an empty sound; book-copyright, far less valuable, was, we know, secure; nor is it credible that the stage-right was legally dissolved, if the author went into print: otherwise, the managers would have objected to the dramatist going into print, and the managers were clearly masters of the situation.

Macklin v. Richardson—A.D. 1770. Macklin, author of a MS. farce, used to play it, but never printed. Richardson took it down shorthand from the actor's lips, and printed it. Macklin filed an injunction. Defendant tried the reasoning of Mr. Justice Yates: "Plaintiff had flown his bird; had given his ideas to the public, and no member of the public could be restrained from doing what he liked with them." This piece of thieves' cant failed, and the injunction was made perpetual. This is a pure copy-right case; stage-right never entered the discussion. Coleman v. Wathen, and Murray v. Elliston, were neither copyright, nor stage-right, but bastard cases, where the wrong plaintiff came into court. They arose out of an imperfect vocabulary. "Words are the counters of wise men, but the money of fools," says Lord Bacon: the sole right of printing being represented by a good hard substantive, any mind could realize that right, but the sole right of representation not being represented by a substantive, the soft heads of little lawyers could not realize its distinct existence and heterogeneous character. One has only to supply the substantive, stage-right, and the fog flies.

Coleman v. Wathen.—O'Keefe wrote a play; by this act he created two properties assignable to distinct traders—a common-law right, stage-right; and a statutory right, copyright. He assigned the copyright to Coleman in terms that could not possibly convey the stage-right. Wathen played the play piratically at Richmond. This was an infraction of O'Keefe's stage-right, but not of Coleman's copyright: yet bad legal advisers sent not O'Keefe, but Coleman, into court as plaintiff.

Coleman produced in court an assignment of copyright, and sued under the Act of Parliament for breach of it: but that statutory right had never been infringed. As for the stage-right, it never came into court at all; it stayed outside with O'Keefe and the common-law.

Murray v. Elliston.—The same error. Lord Byron, by writing "Sardanapalus," created stage-right at common-law, and copyright by statute. He assigned the copyright to Murray. He could have assigned the stage-right to Morris. By not assigning it to anybody he retained it. "Expressum facit cessare tacitum." Elliston played "Sardanapalus." If Murray had been well advised, he would have sent off a courier to Lord Byron, and obtained an assignment of the common-law right of representation. Instead of that, this assignee of the copyright went to Eldon, and asked him to restrain a piracy upon the author's stage-right, which was actually at that moment the author's property and not Murray's. Now it is sworn in the Blue-book of 1832 that Lord Eldon never refused an injunction to a manager, who had purchased a stage-right. But of course when not a manager, but a publisher, the assignee of a statutory copyright, came to him to restrain an infringement of common-law stage-right, he declined to interfere, and sent the plaintiff to Westminster. The judges decided against this plaintiff, but did not give their reasons. That is very unusual; but how could they give their reasons? The poor dear souls had not got the words to explain with. Existing language was a mere trap. They had got one word for two distinct properties: so they very wisely avoided their vehicle of confusion, language, and acted the just distinction they could not speak for want of a substantive. There is no reason to suppose that they would have denied the title of a theatrical manager armed with an assignment of the stage-right in "Sardanapalus." There was a side question of abridgment in Murray v. Elliston, but that was for a jury. The judges had nothing to do with that: what they denied was Murray's right to bring an action; and they were right: he was no more the plaintiff than my grandmother was.

Morris v. Kelly.—This is the only stage-right case in the books. Morris, manager of the Haymarket Theatre, was not a dealer in copyrights, but stage-rights. He produced, not an assignment of O'Keefe's copyright, as Coleman had done, but good prima facie evidence that he had purchased O'Keefe's stage-right. The very same judge, who declined to assist the assignee of Byron's copyright in a case of piratical representation, granted an injunction with downright alacrity when the assignee of O'Keefe's stage-right stood before him. The play, whose performance was thus restrained, had been in print ever so long. Therefore, the theory that under the common law stage-right exists in a MS., but expires if the play is printed, received no countenance from that learned and wary judge, Lord Eldon. I knew the plaintiff, Morris: he was a most respectable man; he has sworn before Parliament that Lord Eldon constantly granted injunctions in support of a manager's stage-right. Morris's evidence is incidentally confirmed by "Godson on Patents:" he mentions an injunction, Morris v. Harris, which is not reported.

The sworn deposition of Morris, and the support given to it by the two recorded cases, Morris v. Kelly, and the unreported case mentioned by Godson, would be meagre evidence, if opposed; but there is nothing at all to set against that evidence—not a case, not a dictum; and it accords with the prices of plays, play-books, and story-books in prose and verse, for 150 years, 1657—1810. Stage-right, therefore, in unprinted plays was, by admission, a creature of the common law and the natural product of common justice: the immense publicity given to the author's ideas by representation did not justify the public in carrying away the words to represent them in another theatre. Printing a play would greatly facilitate piracy: but the power to misappropriate is not the right to misappropriate. That printing a play could actually forfeit so heterogeneous a property as stage-right is a conjecture. What little evidence there is runs against the forfeiture. Up to the Commonwealth, the Chamberlain, alleging property, stopped violation of stage-right in plays, whether they were printed or not. After the Restoration we have only the evidence of prices for 150 years, and Lord Eldon's judgment. He protected stage-right after publication, and his is the only judicial decision that touches stage-right at common-law, either in MSS. or play-books.

If, therefore, we are to go by impartial principles of law and the best direct evidence we can get, and superior weight of judicial authority, speaking obiter in Donaldson v. Becket, and ad rem in Morris v. Kelly, stage-right in MSS., and even in printed plays, was like copyright, a creature of common sense, common justice, and common law; but, like copyright, is now a nursling of statutes, thanks to a sudden onslaught by pirates. For, if law be ever so clear, but carry no penalty for breach, property is the sport of accident; so, on the close of the war in 1815, monopoly and piracy fell upon the dramatist, and destroyed him. Two theatres got the sole right to play legitimate pieces in London, and this made the author their slave. They robbed him of his three nights' overplus, and threw him a few pounds for a drama worth thousands. As to the provincial theatres, a single pirate drove all the dramatists clean out of them. Here is a copy of his public advertisement—and please observe it is unprinted plays he pirates wholesale:—"Mr. Kenneth, at the corner of Bow Street, will supply any gentleman with any manuscript on the lowest terms"—and here is an example:—Mr. Douglas Jerrold gives evidence to the Parliamentary Commission, Blue-book, p. 156:—"The Rent Day' was played in the country a fortnight after it was produced at Drury Lane, and I have a letter in my pocket in which a provincial manager said he would willingly have given me £5 for a copy, had he not before paid £2 for it to some stranger" (meaning Kenneth). The method of this caitiff is revealed in another quarter. "Kenneth went to the theatre with a shorthand writer, who took the words down and the mise-en-scène. He had copyists ready at home to transcribe, and the stolen goods were on their way to the provincial theatres in a few hours." But the London theatres also pirated the author. Moncrieff deposed that he produced "Giovanni," a musical piece, at a minor theatre. Drury Lane, one of the two theatres that had a monopoly in legitimate pieces, sent into Surrey, stole this illegitimate piece, and played it in the teeth of the author. The manager made thousands by it, and brought out Madame Vestris in it, and she made thousands. It was only the poor author that was swindled for enriching both manager and actor. That victim of ten thousand wrongs dared not resist this piece of scoundrelism; the managers would have excluded him altogether from the market, narrowed by monopoly.

But piracy has also its indirect effects. Even honest people will not give much for a property they see others stealing. By "The Rent Day" the theatre cleared twenty thousand pounds; but the author only £150; and for "Black-eyed Susan," which saved Manager Elliston from bankruptcy and made him flourish like a green bay-tree, the author received only £60; whereas the actor, Cooke, who played a single part in it, cleared £4,000 during its first run, and afterwards made a fortune out of it in the country theatres, which did not pay the author at all.

The Commissioners proceeded fairly. They heard the authors relate their wrongs, the monopolists defend their monopolies, and the pirates prove their thefts pure patriotisms as usual: and they reported to Parliament a deep decline of the British drama, and denounced as its two causes, the monstrous monopoly of the managers, and the insecurity of the author's property; on the latter head these are their instructive words: "A dramatic author at present is subjected to indefensible hardship and injustice, and the disparity of the protection afforded to his labours, when compared even with that granted to authors in any other branch of letters, seems alone sufficient to divert the ambition of eminent and successful writers from that department of intellectual exertion."

Thereupon Parliament, in the interest of justice and sound national policy, took away from the two patent theatres their wicked monopoly, and secured the property of a dramatist by a stringent enactment. The last link in the evidence is the statute itself. 3 & 4 Will. IV. did not create a property; it found one; and it found a law, but ineffectual. The title, which is evidence, when not contradicted in the body of an Act, runs thus:—"An Act to amend the laws relating to dramatic literary property." Then, as to the Act itself, it protects the dramatist so sharply, that if Parliament had been creating a right, they would certainly have fixed a term. But they respected the common-law right they were nursing, and left it perpetual; and this, to my personal knowledge, they did because of the growing disgust to the spoliation authors had suffered from preceding Parliaments. What this Parliament thought was, that stage-right existed for ever in unprinted dramas; and they laboured to extend the right to its just consequences, and protect it for ever by special provisions. When the right had been a statutory right for ten years, it got curtailed; but Parliament, that took it from the common law, did not curtail it.

This is the mere legal history of two sacred properties up to the dates when Parliament, after profound consideration, and full discussion at wide intervals, did, without haste, or prejudice, or any of those perturbing influences with which Lord Camden corrupted the Peers in his day, declare both these properties to be not monopolies, but personal properties. The full statutory definition amounts to this—"they are personal properties, so sacred during the term of their statutory existence, that they carry a main feature of real property; the very proprietor cannot convey them to another, by word of mouth: and indeed a bare licence to print, or to perform in a theatre, concurrently with the proprietor, is void, unless given in writing." This distinct recognition of property was a return, in principle, to the common law, and the principle was too just and healthy not to grow and expand. Exceptional law is bad law, and stands still. Good law is of wide application, and therefore grows.

When one nation takes wider views of justice or durable policy than other nations, we do not say like our forefathers, "That nation is hare-brained." We say, nowadays, "That nation is before the rest;" implying that we shall be sure to follow, soon or late: and we always do. France saw thirty years ago that children must not be starved, and so murdered, by adulterated milk. She enlisted science; detected, fined, imprisoned, the adulterators, and made them advertise their own disgrace in several journals. She was not mad, nor divine; she was human, but ahead. Prussia saw long ago that the minds of children must be protected, like their other reversionary interests. If, therefore, parents were so wicked as to bring children into the world and not educate them, she warned, she fined, she imprisoned, the indulgent and self-indulgent criminals. She was before other nations, that is all. England was the first to see free trade. She was before the rest of Europe, that is all. France saw, ages ago, that if A creates by labour a new intellectual production, and B makes one of its vehicles, the paper, and C and D set up, and work, the type, which is another vehicle, and print the sheets, and E (the publisher) sells the intellectual production, together with its vehicles, in volumes to F (the retail bookseller), and F sells them to the public, all these workers and traders must be remunerated in some proportion to what they contribute; and that the nationality either of A, B, C, D, E, or F is equally irrelevant; and it is monstrous to pick out A, whose contribution to the value is the largest, and say, You are a foreigner, and therefore you can claim neither property, nor wages, nor profit in France, though the smaller contributors, B, C, D, E, and F, have a right to be remunerated, whether they are foreigners or not. French jurists, with the superior logic of their race, saw this years ago, and in 1851 we all began to follow the leading nation, according to our lights: and they were blinkers; because we were not Latins, but Anglo-Saxons: God has not made us jurists; so the devil steps in, whenever we are off our guard, and makes us pettifoggers.

I am going to ask brother Jonathan a favour. I want him to cast a side glance, but keen—as himself—at what passed between France and England from 1851-1875 inclusively, and then ask himself honestly whether the European things I shall relate do not appeal to his own sense of justice and true public policy. The United States of America can teach us, and have taught us, many things. We can teach them a few things; not that we are wiser, but that we are older. Age alone brings certain experiences. In the United States Piracy says, “I will get you a constant supply of good cheap books and dramas: it is your interest to encourage me, and not to foster literary poverty.” Piracy says this in the United States, and is believed. Why not? It looks like a self-evident truth. But piracy has said this in Europe many times, and in many generations, and in many countries, and has been believed, and believed, and believed. But European nations have, by repeated trials, at sundry times, and in divers places, found out whether what piracy says is a durable truth, or a plausible lie. Thus, what in America is still a matter of intelligent conjecture, has become, in Europe, a matter of absolute, proved, demonstrated certainty; and, on this account, I ask American statesmen for the first time in their lives to bring the powers of their mind really to bear on the European facts I shall relate, and am ready to depose to on oath either before an American Congress or a British Parliament.

CHARLES READE.

FIFTH LETTER.

SIR,—INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT AND STAGE-RIGHT, A.D. 1851
—52.

It is instructive to look back and see how this great advance in justice and public policy was received by different classes.

1. The managers of our theatres, and the writers of good French pieces into bad English ones, showed uneasiness and hostility.

2. The British publishers, dead apathy. M. Pagnerre, President of the "Cercle de la Libraire," came to London to invite their hearty co-operation; "but found them indifferent except as regards America. To the moral bearings of the question they appeared tolerably callous."—Athenæum, September 20, 1851. This was afterwards proved by the prodigious silence of their organs. On this, the greatest literary event of modern times, the Quarterly Review, the Edinburgh, the British Quarterly, London and Westminster, Blackwood, Fraser, the New Monthly, North British, Christian Observer, Eclectic Review, Dublin Review, Dublin University Review, delivered no notice nor comment, not one syllable. They shut out contemporary daylight, and went on cooking the stale cabbage of small old ages, by the light of a farthing candle.

3. This phenomenal obtuseness was not shared by the journals and weeklies. The journalists, though they have little personal interest in literary property, being remunerated in a different way, uttered high and disinterested views of justice and public policy. They welcomed the treaty unanimously. Accept a few articles as index to the rest. Examiner, 1851, November 29; 1852, January 24, September 4, October 30. Leader, 1851, November 15, November 29. Sunday Times, December 7, 1851. Era, same date. Critic, 1851, March 15, February 2, 1852. The Times, 1851, November 19 and November 26; also December 1, page 4, column 6. Illustrated London News, 1851, May 24. Literary Gazette, 1851, May 24, July 5, November 15, November 22, December 13. Athenæum, 1851, January 18, March 15 and 29, June 7, August 2, September 20, November 22. Art Journal, 1851,

September and November. The New York Literary World, March, 1851. It would be agreeable to my own feelings to go through these articles; they bristle with hard facts proving that piracy upon foreigners is a mere blight on literature, and a special curse to the nation the pirate lives in. But, perhaps, a reader or two, like those St. Paul calls noble, will search the matter, and to save time, the rest may believe me, writing with the notes before me. I will, however, select a good specimen. A letter from Cologne, by an old observer of piratical translations in Germany, states that thirty years before date, good translations of Scott came into the German market; Bulwer followed, then Dickens. They were read with avidity; so, not being property, rival translations came out by the dozen. This cut down the profits, and the rival publishers were obliged to keep reducing the pay of the translators—till at last it got to £6 for translating 3 vols. Act 1.

Act 2. Bad translations, by incompetent hands, bad type, bad paper: valueless as literature; yet, by English reputation and cheapness, under-selling the German inventor. Death to the German novelist; a mere fraud on the German public—bad translations being counterfeit coin—and no good to any German publisher, because they all tore the speculation to rags at the first symptom of a sale. Literary Gazette, November 15, 1851.

The Times, November 26, 1851, supported the proposed treaty in a leader, taking the higher ground of morality, justice, and humanity, but omitting sound national policy. The leader contains such observations as these:—"Intellectual produce has been the only description of goods excluded from equitable conditions of exchange."—"Genius has been outlawed. The property it should have owned has, by the comity of nations, been treated as the goods of a convicted felon." After giving examples of French, English, and American genius pillaged, the writer goes on thus:—"Still worse, copies were multiplied at a cheap rate in Brussels, and disseminated all over the Continent."—"There has long existed a profound immorality of thought with regard to the productions of genius."—"How short-sighted the policy has been, the example of Belgium evinces. The effect of its habitual piracy has simply been the extinction of literary genius throughout Belgium."

The Illustrated London News, May 24, 1851, welcomed in ternational justice, and put the logic of international larceny rather neatly:—"An English book was treated like any other commodity produced by skill and industry, and so was a foreigner's watch; but not a foreigner's book."

In a word, the British journalists, all those years ago, showed rare enlightenment, and personal generosity; for there are no writers more able, and indeed few so surprising to poor Me, as the first-class journalist, whose mind can pour out treasures with incredible swiftness, and at any hour, however unfavourable to composition; bed-time to wit, or even digestion-time. Yet these remarkable men, in their business sacrifice personal reputation, and see it enjoyed by moderate writers of books: this would sour a petty mind, and the man would say, like Lord Camden, "Let authors be content with the reputation they gain; and what is literary property to me? I have no stake in it." But these gentlemen showed themselves higher-minded than Lord Camden; they silenced egotism, and rose unanimously to the lofty levels of international justice, and sound policy; and it would ill become me, and my fellows, in Great Britain and America, to forget this good deed, or to pass it by without a word of gratitude and esteem.

4. With less merit, because we were interested, every author worthy of the name hailed the new morality with ardour. The American authors in particular conceived hopes that justice and sound policy would cross a wider water, than the ditch, which had hitherto obstructed the march of justice in Europe; and they organized a club to support the movement, with Mr. Bryant for president.

I myself had glorious hopes I now look back on with bitter melancholy. I was one of the very few men who foresaw a glorious future for the British drama. It was then so thoroughly divorced from literature, and so degraded, that scholars in general believed it could never again rear its head, which once towered above all nations. But I was too well read in its previous fluctuations, and, above all, in their causes, to mistake a black blight on the leaves for a decayed root. England is by nature the most dramatic country in the world; piracy, while it lasts, has always been able to overpower nature, and always will; but, piracy got rid of, nature revives. The condition of the theatre, in 1851, was this—a province of France, governed by English lieutenants, writers without genius, petty playwrights, public critics, who could get their vile versions of a French play publicly praised by the other members of their clique. The manager was generally an actor thirsting for this venal praise. If he produced an original play, he was pretty sure not to get it; but, by dealing with the clique for stolen goods, he secured an article that suited him to a T; it was cheap, nasty, praised. The first-class theatres, whose large receipts qualified them to encourage the British inventor, barred him out with new French plays, or old English ones—anything they could steal; yet they could spend £80 a night for actors and singers.

Haymarket Theatre, 1851. Opened with Macready's farewells. Began its pieces, February 4, with "Good for Nothing" (French); February 6, "Presented at Court" (French); March 3, "Don Cæsar de Bazan" (French); March 8, "Othello"; March 25, "Tartuffe" (French); March 27, "Make the Best of It" (French); April 21, "Arline" (a piratical burlesque of an English opera); May 3, "Retired from Business" (English, perhaps); May 26, "Crown Diamonds" (French); June 18, "The Cadi" (French); June 23, "John Dobbs" (French); June 24, Mr. Hackett, an American actor, in Falstaff, &c.; July 1, "Grimshaw, Bagshaw, and Bradshaw" (French); July 7, "Son and Stranger" (German); August 13, "The Queen of a Day" (I don't know whether original or French); August 21, "His First Champagne" (French); "Tartuffe" and "The Serious Family" (both French); September 10, "Grandmother Grizzle" (French); October 11, "La Sonnambula" (Italian), "Grandmother Grizzle" (French), and "Grimshaw," &c.; October 14, "Sonnambula" and "Mrs. White" (French); November 17, "Charles the Second" (French), "God Save the King"—a Jacobite song, the words and treble by Henry Carey, the bass by Smith (Carey sang "God Save King James" till the tide turned against the Stuarts, and carried this melody with it, lines and all)—"Rough Diamond" (French); November 18, "The Ladies' Battle" (French); November 25, "The Two Bonnycastles" (French); November 26, "The Beggar's Opera" (Old English); December 9, "The Man of Law" (French); December 2, "The Princess Radiant" (doubtful).

The Lyceum. January 1 to March 24, "King Charming" (French story dramatized), and farces; March 24, "Cool as a Cucumber" (French); April 21, "Queen of the Frogs" (French fairy tale); May 20, "Only a Clod" (French); June 4, "Court Beauties" (French); October 2, "Game of Speculation" (French), "Forty and Fifty" (French), "Practical Man" (English, I think): December 26, "Prince of Happy Land" (French story dramatized). This is no selection, but the whole business of these first-class London theatres, and a true picture of the drama in the City of Shakspeare.

I comprehended the entire situation, and saw that the new treaty was a godsend, and might give England back her drama, if supported heartily. I visited France, and many of her dramatists; we hailed the rising sun of justice together, and, as good words without deeds are rushes and reeds, I gave Auguste Maquet £40 for his new drama, "Le Château de Grantier."

The promised Act of Parliament came out. Alas!—what a disappointment! A penny dole, clogged with a series of ill-natured conditions. It was like a mother's conscience compelled to side with a stranger against the child of her heart—"Oh, they all tell me he is a blackguard; but he is such a darling." It was full of loopholes for the sweet pirate: full of gins, and springes, and traps for authors and honest traders.

International Copyright.—The State sells to the foreign author the sole right of translation and sale in England, for a petty period, on cruel conditions. 1.—He must notify on the title-page of the original work that he reserves the right of translation. 2.—He must register the original work at our Stationers' Hall—a rat-hole in the City—and deposit a copy gratis within three months after first publication. 3.—Must publish authorized translation in England within one year. 4.—Must register that translation, and deposit a copy in our rat-hole, within a certain time.—15 & 16 Vict. cap. 12. In short, the State is "Alma mater" to the rascal, "injusta noverca" to the honest trader.

The poor wretch, protected after this fashion, glares and trembles, and says to himself, "Incedo per ignes." The first stipulation is reasonable, and all-sufficient; the rest are utterly superfluous, vexatious, oppressive, ill-natured. If the foreign author and his assignee escape by a miracle all these gins, springes, and author-traps, the State secures them for five years only what was their own for ever jure divino, and by the law of France, and by the universal human law of productive, unsalaried labour, without any gins, springes, or ill-natured, catch-penny conditions whatever.

Stipulations 1, 2, and 4, same as above.

3. Must publish the authorized translation in England within three months of registering original play, &c.

In this clause, and indeed in No. 2, you see the old unhappy confusion of stage-right with copyright. Why, in the name of common sense, is the dramatist, because he objects to be swindled in a theatre, to be compelled to publish? Publication is not a dramatist's market. There is no sale for a play-book in England nowadays. How can the poor wretch afford to translate and publish a translated play, of which the public would not take six copies, though he should spend £100 advertising? Such imbecile legislation makes one's blood boil. Was ever so larcenous a tax on honesty? It is a pecuniary premium on Theatrical Piracy; that kind of pirate does not print; he merely steals and sells to the Theatre; so his "alma mater," and our "injusta noverca," does not persecute him with any tyrannical and irrelevant tax applicable to copyright, but not to stage-right. It only bleeds the everlasting victim, the honest author.

But there was worse behind. When the victim of ten thousand wrongs has been bled out of all the money it costs to publish an unsaleable translation, and has escaped the gins, springes, author-traps, and probity-scourges, and looks for his penny dole, his paltry five years' stage-right, then he is encountered with a perfidious proviso.

"Nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent fair imitation or adaptation to the English stage of any dramatic piece or musical composition published in any foreign country, but only of piratical translations."

Now, the English theatre has seldom played a translation; the staple piracy from 1662 to 1852, and long after, was by altering the names of men and places from French to English, shortening and vulgarizing the dialogue, and sometimes combining two French pieces, and sometimes altering the sex of a character or two; sometimes, though very rarely, adding a character, as Mawworm in "The Hypocrite" adapted from "Tartuffe." But whether servile or loose, the versions from French pieces were adaptations, not honest translations; and all the more objectionable, since here a dunce gratifies his vanity as well as his dishonesty, and shams originality, which is a fraud on the English public as well as on the French writer; moreover, it is the adaptation swindle that turns French truths into English lies. The Legislature, therefore, appeared to say this:—"The form of piracy most convenient to the English dramatic pirate seems to be not direct reproduction; but colourable piracy. We will profit by that experience. We will compel the honest dealer to translate literally; we will put the poor devil to the expenso of publishing his literal translation. No manager will ever play his literal translation. However, to make sure of that, we now legalize piracy in the established and fashionable form of fair adaptation or imitation."

This, after one's experiences of the Anglo-Saxon pettifogger, seemed to reveal that animal at work defiling the scheme of the Latin jurists, and ensnaring his favourite victim, an author's property: and so it turned out to be. We soon learned how the trick had been done; a piratical manager had employed a piratical writer to crawl up the back stairs of the House of Commons, and earwig Lord Palmerston, and get this proviso inserted to swindle the French dramatist. The Minister, I need hardly say, did not realize what a perfidy he was lending himself to, and the French Government had no chance of divining the swindle, because this thief's cant of "fair adaptations and imitations" is entirely English; the Frenchmen did not even know what the words meant, nor are they translateable; "imitations faites de bonne foi" has quite a different sense from "fair imitations;" and how could they suspect that a great nation, treating with them on professedly higher views of national justice than had heretofore prevailed, could hold out its right hand to receive protection of its main intellectual export—magazines, reviews, histories, biographies, novels—yet with its left hand slyly filch away the main intellectual export of the nation it was dealing with, in time of peace and in declared amity?

History, thank God, offers few examples of such turpitude. But why? It is only because legislators, in protecting any other class of property, are never so weak as to take advice of pirates—a set of God-abandoned miscreants, whose advice to us, and to you, Brother Jonathan, and to any other nation on the globe, is always a compound of Newgate and Bedlam.

When the French did find the Satanic juggle out, they concealed neither their disgust nor their contempt. They reminded each other that their fathers had used a certain phrase, "Perfide Albion," which we had treated as a jest. Was it such a jest after all? Could we discover a more accurate epitaph for this piece of dastardly juggling?

Comptez donc sur les traités signés par le mensonge, Ces actes solennels avec art préparés ;

and here a quatrain on the “fair imitations” that our Legislature protected and secured gratis as soon as ever it had decoyed the poor honest gull into the expense of publishing the translation that no creature could try to read nor theatre would play :—

Quoiqu'en disent certains railleurs,
J'imite, et jamais je ne pille.
Vous avez raison, Monsieur Drille :
Oui, vous imitez—les voleurs.

The Satanic proviso that disgraced us in the eyes of a noble nation recoiled, as it always does and always will, Brother Jonathan, upon the nation that had been inveigled into legalizing piracy. It postponed the great British drama for another quarter of a century. Colourable piracy of French pieces being legalized instead of crushed, drove the native dramatist off the boards. The shops were limited by monopoly (6 and 7 Victoria), and piracy enabled a clique of uninventive writers to monopolize the goods. If, by a miracle, a genuine dramatist got a play played, then piracy punished him in another way. The price was not a remuneration, but a punishment, of labour and skill. I saved a first-class theatre from bankruptcy, with a drama. I received only £110; and the last ten pounds I had to county-court the manager for; gratitude is too good a thing to waste on that ethereal vapour, yclept an author. For “Masks and Faces,” a comedy which has survived a thousand French pieces, and more, Mr. Taylor and I received £150. In France it would have been £4,000. For “Two Loves and a Life,” a drama that has been played throughout Anglo-Saxony, and is played to this day, we received £100. In France it would have been worth £5,000. The reason is, a manager was—through bad legislation—a fence, or receiver of stolen goods, and he would only pay fence's prices even to inventors. I am known, I believe, as a novelist; but my natural gift was for the drama: my greatest love was for the drama; yet the Satanic proviso, and the colourable piracy it inflicted on the nation, drove me off the boards, and many other men of similar calibre. I beg attention to this. not as a personal wrong; in that light I should be ashamed to lay it before the English and American public, but as one of a thousand useful examples, that nature gives way before piracy. Able men always did, and always must, turn from their natural market, choked, defiled, and lowered, by piracy, to some other less congenial business, where there is fair play. This is how American literature is even now depopulated. I invite evidence from American authors.

The Satanic proviso injured the drama. A French truth, I repeat, may be an English lie; and, as the adapter puts English names of men and places to French pieces, this happened eternally. The maids and wives presented on the English stage were called Mrs. and Miss; but the situations and sentiments were French. Thus the women of England were habitually misrepresented. Now the public gets tired of a shop that keeps selling false pictures of familiar objects.

The Satanic proviso injured our drama in a third way. Property never blocks the theatre; piracy always. "The Courier of Lyons" was played in nearly every London theatre, one year, 1855; and made the theatre unpopular by monotony. "The Corsican Brothers" was played in every London theatre without exception, and in many of them at the same time. In the drama's healthy day each theatre played its own pieces. But, under the hoof of piracy, variety is crushed: in one month, viz. May, 1852, the Princess's Theatre played "The Corsican Brothers," Surrey Theatre "Corsican Brothers," Haymarket "O Gemini!"—a burlesque on the subject, and Olympic "Camberwell Brothers." Adelphi, which had played "The Corsican Brothers," was playing "The Queen of the Market" ("La Dame de la Halle"); Strand, "The Lost Husband" ("La Dame de la Halle"); Lyceum, "Chain of Events" ("La Dame de la Halle"). As for "Don Cæsar de Bazan," that piece entirely blocked the first-class London theatres for months; and I, who write these lines, fled to Paris, where "Don Cæsar" was property, merely to get away from the doomed city, where "Don Cæsar," not being property, had become a monotony-scurge, and an emptier of theatres into music-halls, public-houses, and Baptist chapels.

In 1859, though I had left the theatre in despair, I still thought it my duty to combat the Satanic proviso for the benefit of the nation and of other dramatists, whom it would otherwise stifle, as it had me. I wrote a book denouncing it on the two grounds of justice and public policy: and I appealed, in that book, to the commercial probity and good sense of the House of Commons, and the sense of honour in legal matters which resides, theoretically, in the bosom of the Peers. I sowed good seed: and it fell among stones. I hope for better luck this time. But were I sure to fail, and fail, as long as I live, I would still sow the good seed, that cannot wholly die; for it is truth immortal.

There being, at that time, a great outcry against American piracy, I publicly denied that the United States had ever been guilty of any act so dishonest, disloyal, and double-faced, as Great Britain had committed by treating with France for international rights, and contriving, under cover of that treaty, to steal the main intellectual property of that empire; and I offered to bet £70 to £40 this was so. "The Eighth Commandment," p. 156. I refer to that now, because it is a fair proof I am one, who can hold the balance between my native country and the United States; and such I think are the men, to whom that great Republic should lend an ear; for such men are somewhat rare: they have some claim to be called citizens of the world, and are as incapable of deliberate injustice, as sham patriots are incapable either of national justice, or national wisdom.

In 1866 I was examined, before the House of Commons, by Mr. Goschen, and cross-examined by members rather hostile to my views. I answered 150 questions, most of them judiciously put; and full a third of them bore on the effects of national piracy in injuring the nation that pirates. Cross-examination trebles the value of evidence; and therefore I recommend it with some confidence to the study of those, who care enough for the truth in these matters, to prefer the sunlight of experience to that jack-o'-lantern, a priori reasoning. I have no time to quote more than one answer:—"If you strike out that clause (the Satanic proviso), I pledge you my honour as a gentleman that you will see a great drama arise in England." (Report of the Select Committee on Theatrical Licences. Price 3s. 8d. Index 9d. Hansard, Great Queen-street, London.)

1875.—Parliament has rescinded the Satanic proviso, and thereby laid the first stone of a great British drama, as time will show.

Between 1852 and 1875 I felt, with many others, that the American Legislature is cruel and unjust to authors; but I have never urged it with any spirit, because my noble ardour was chilled by a precept of the highest possible authority—to say nothing of its morality and good sense. I think it runs to this effect, errors excepted: “Take out first the beam that is in thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to take out the mote in Brother Jonathan’s eye.”

Now this year, Parliament having at last taken the beam out of my eye, I do see my way to address a remonstrance to that great nation, which hangs aloof from modern progress, and selects for hatred, contempt, and outlawry, while living, those superior men, whose dead bones it worships.

CHARLES READE.

SIXTH LETTER.

SIR,—INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT WITH AMERICA:—The question has been mooted for forty years, and various British Governments have made languid movements towards obtaining justice for British and American authors. These have failed; languor often does: so now faint-hearted souls say “Oh, it is no use: you might as well appeal to the Andes against snow, or to a hog in his neighbour’s garden for clemency to potatoes, as ask the Americans for humanity to British authors.”

Before I can quite believe this, they must write out of my head, and my heart, that this American people, torn by civil war, and heart-sore at what seemed our want of principle and just sympathy, sent over a large sum of money to relieve the British cotton-spinners, whom that war, and their own imprudent habits, had brought low. Moreover, I can never despair of a cause, because it has been bungled forty years. There is a key to every lock; and, if people will go on trying the wrong keys for forty years, that is no proof that the right key will fail for forty more. To find the right key, we must survey—for the first time—the whole American situation. It comprises five parties; the judges—the Legislature—the authors—the publishers—the people.

The judges—what, in speaking to a Frenchman, we call the law of England, is, in America, the common law of both countries: our common ancestors grew it: the American colonists carried it in their breasts across the Atlantic; and it has the same authority in the States as here: it bows to legislative enactments; but, wherever they are silent, it is the law of the land. An American lawyer, who cites it with the reverence it really deserves, does not pay us any compliment. He is going back to the wisdom and justice of his own ancestors. Now Congress not having meddled with international copyright or stage-right, an English author's copyright in New York, A.D. 1875, is what it was in London before the Statute of Queen Anne, and his stage-right what it was before 3 and 4 William IV.

Half our battle is won in the courts; for the American judges concede to an English author stage-right in unprinted dramas. "Keene v. Wheatley;" 9 American Law Reg. 23. "Crowe v. Aitken;" 4 Am. Law Review, 23, and other cases.

And they concede copyright in unpublished manuscripts ("Palmer v. de Witt," &c.).

If, under the latter head, they tied the sole right of printing to the paper and handwriting of the manuscript, our case would be hopeless. But they disown this theory, and give a British author the incorporeal right, that is, the sole right to print his composition, though the pirate may be in as lawful possession of a copy as is the public purchaser of a printed book. I shall now prove that full international copyright is included in that admission.

There are three theories of copyright at common law:—

The washerwoman's theory.

The lawyer's theory.

The mad sophist's theory.

THE WASHERWOMAN'S THEORY.—That there can be no incorporeal property at common law. An author's manuscript is property. If another misappropriates it, and prints the words, that is unlawful; but the root of the offence is misappropriating the material object, the author's own written paper. Thus, if a hen is taken unlawfully, to sell the eggs she lays after misappropriation is unlawful.

The lawyer's and the sophist's theory both rest on a fundamental theory opposed to the above, viz. that an author's mental labour, intellectual and physical, creates a mixed property, words on paper; that the words are valuable as vehicles of ideas, and are a property distinct from the paper; and only the author has a right to print them under any circumstances. Examples:—Pope wrote letters to various people: they paid the postage; the paper, and the inked forms of the letters, became theirs, and ceased to be Pope's. Curll possessed this corporeal property lawfully. Yet Pope restrained the printing. "Pope v. Curll."

Lord Clarendon gave a written copy of the famous history to a friend. That gentleman's son inherited it. Had Lord Clarendon's heir misappropriated this written paper, he could have been indicted, and sent to gaol. Yet, when the lawful possessor of the transcript sent it to press, with the words on it not written by the author's hand, but conveying the author's ideas, Lord Clarendon's heir sued him, nearly a century after the history was composed, and obtained heavy damages. "Duke of Queensbury v. Shebbeare." There are many other cases, including "Macklin v. Richardson," and "Palmer v. De Witt," lately tried in New York. But this peculiar position in "Queensbury v. Shebbeare," is the best to scrutinize. A is the lawful possessor, by inheritance, of a transcript. B is the author's heir. If B steals A's transcript, he can be indicted; if A prints his own transcript, he violates the pure incorporeal copyright of B, and cannot be indicted, but can be sued on the case for violation of a property as incorporeal and detached from paper and all other material substance, as any that was confirmed to an author by Queen Anne's Statute, or the Acts of Congress in re.

THE LAWYER'S THEORY.—When an author exerts this admitted incorporeal right, by printing and publishing, a new party enters, the public purchaser; he acquires new rights, which have to be weighed against the author's existing right strengthened by possession; for the author has created a large material property under his title, which would be destroyed as property if his copyright was forfeited by publication.

How our ancestors dealt with this situation is a simple matter of history; therefore we distrust speculation entirely and go by the legal evidence.

THE MAD SOPHIST'S THEORY rejects with us the washer-woman's theory, and concedes that an author has, at common law, intellectual property, or copyright, thus abridged—he has the sole right, under any circumstances whatever, to print his unprinted words. But, when he publishes, he sells the volumes without reserve ; he cannot abridge his contract with the reader, and retain the sole right under which he printed. He has abandoned his copyright by the legal force of his act, and this is so self-evident that the sophist declines to receive evidence against it. Whether copyright in printed books existed before Queen Anne's Act, he decides in a later age, whose modes of thinking are different, by a priori reasoning, and refuses to inquire how old the word "copy" is, or what is meant under the Tudor and Stuart Princes, in acts of State, licensing Acts, and legal assignments, or to look into the case of "Roper v. Streater," "Eyre v. Walker," or any other legal evidence whatever.

This was the ground taken by Justice Yates in "Millar v. Taylor." He founded a school of copyright sophists, reasoning à priori against a four-peaked mountain of evidence. He furnished the whole artillery of falsehood, the romantic and alluring phrases "a gift to the public," &c., the equivoques, and confusions of ideas, among which the very landmarks of truth are lost to unguarded men.

Since it is this British pettifogger who, in the great Republic, stands between us and the truth—between us and law—between us and morality—between us and humanity—between us and the eighth commandment of God the Father—between us and the golden rule of God the Son, Judge Yates becomes, like Satan, quite an important equivocator, and I must undeceive mankind about Judge Yates and his fitness to rule the Anglo-Saxon mind.

In "Millar v. Taylor," the case, that has given Judge Yates so great a temporary importance in England and America, the main question was a simple historical fact: did copyright in printed books, which preceded legislation in France and Holland, also precede in England a certain enactment called Queen Anne's Statute? No à priori reasoning was needed here. The Latin jurists used none to ascertain the identical fact in their own country, and therefore, with no better evidence than we have, they are unanimous. We are divided by a priori reasoning on fact.

In "Millar v. Taylor" two modes of searching truth encountered each other on the narrow ground, each party rejecting the washerwoman's theory, and admitting pure copyright, but disputing whether in England it was forfeited by publication.

One method is by à priori reasoning, and was the method of the Greek sophists, and mediæval schoolmen.

The other is by observation, and evidence, and is the method of Lord Bacon and his pupils.

Scholars sometimes permit themselves to talk as if the former method was universal in the ancient world. That statement is excessive. Plain men, in their business, anticipated the Baconian method thousands of years ago, as the jury in "Millar v. Taylor" followed it. The Greek sculptors anticipated it, and their hands reached truth, while the philosophers, their contemporaries, were roaming after their will-o'-the-wisp,

And found no end in wandering mazes lost.

There was the pity of it; those, who, by learning, leisure, and ability, were most able to instruct mankind, were enticed by bad example and the arrogance of the intellect, into à priori reasoning, and diverted from docile observation; and so they fell into a system, that kept the sun out, and the door shut.

The other system, in 250 years, has enlightened that world, which lay in darkness.

To test the systems, take any period of 400 years before Lord Bacon, and estimate the progress of the world in knowledge and useful discoveries. Then take the 250 years after Lord Bacon. I vary the figures, out of justice, to allow for increased population.

Lord Bacon was the saviour of the human intellect. He discouraged plausible conjecture, or à priori reasoning, and taught humble, close observation. Thereby he gave the key of the heavens to Newton, and the key of nature, and her forces, to the physical investigator, and the prying mechanic. Man began to cultivate the humble but wise faculty of observation; it grew by cultivation, and taught him how to wrestle with nature for her secrets, and extort them. There is scarcely a branch of useful learning, that method has not improved 500 per cent. Of course, even since Lord Bacon, prejudice has, in holes and corners, resisted observation: but the final result is sure. A priori reasoning bled people to death with the lancet for two centuries after Bacon: but Bacon has conquered the lancet. A handful of Jesuits will tell you that the historical query, whether one Bishop of Rome has contradicted another in faith, must not be learned from contemporary history, but evolved by internal thought a thousand years afterwards. Well, that mediæval crotchet will go, and Bacon stay. And so it must be, sooner or later, with everything, copyright at common law—the national expediency of piracy—the infallibility of men with mitres—everything. The world has tasted Bacon. It will never eat cobwebs again for long.

To put the matter in another form—Such of our common ancestors, Brother Jonathan, as invented phrases, were nearly always acute observers. They called a prodigal “a spend-thrift,” having observed how often that character dissipated the savings of another man. A quarrel, with almost divine sagacity, they called not “a difficulty,” which is a brainless word, but a misunderstanding, and they called a madman a man out of his senses. Why not out of his reason? Well, they had observed. The madman, who did not fly at their throats, but gave them time to study him, did nothing but reason all day, and not illogically; but, blinded by some preconceived idea, could not see, nor hear, nor observe. Intelligent madmen have busy minds, and often argue speciously, but start from some falsehood contradicted by their senses. The senses are the great gates of wisdom, and to the lunatic these gates are always more or less closed by prepossession. Now events distant by space or time cannot be seen nor heard by us, but by persons present. Where they get recorded at the time, the senses of the eye witnesses have spoken; and the pupil of Lord Bacon must have recourse to the senses and report of those persons. Into that evidence he peers, and even cross-examines it, if he can; and he can sometimes; for, when a dead witness makes an admission, it has the effect and value of a truth extracted from a living witness against his will. Where contemporary evidence is abundant, and manifest, it is very reliable, and the man, who opposes à priori reasoning, or preconceived ideas, to it, IS A LUNATIC IN THE SECOND DEGREE.

I feel that I am giving a large key to unlock a small box; but small keys have failed; and Cicero says well, “Errare, falli, labi, tam turpe est quam decipi.” I will, therefore, in my next give The Baconian method v. the method of the ancients, or Millar v. Taylor, showing how an English judge proved, out of the depths of his inner consciousness, that copyright at common law could not have existed, even as a waggish Oxford professor proved, by the same method, that Napoleon Bonaparte could never have existed.

SEVENTH LETTER.

SIR,—The poet Thomson, in 1729, assigned the copyright of “The Seasons” to Millar, his heirs and assigns for ever. In 1763 Taylor printed “The Seasons” and Millar sued him: the case, as handled, turned mainly on whether copyright in printed books was before Queen Anne’s statute. This being a mixed question of law and fact, the opinion of the jury was taken upon documentary evidence, the records of Stationers’ Hall, and many ancient assignments of copyright drawn up by lawyers long before the statute, and others long after it. The defendant had powerful counsel: so this evidence doubtless was sifted, and kept within the rules. The jury brought a special verdict, in which are these words—“And the said jurors, upon their oath, further say that before the reign of her Majesty Queen Anne, it was usual to purchase from authors the perpetual copyright of their books, and assign the same for valuable considerations, and to make the same the subject of family settlements.” The jury here were within their province; they swore not to a matter of law, but to a custom, in which, however, lawyers at different epochs had taken a part by drawing the legal assignments. Most of this evidence has melted away, but the sworn verdict of twelve unprejudiced men of the world remains, and, by the law of England and America, overpowers and indeed annuls, all judicial conjectures in this one matter of fact. On this basis the judges discussed the law, and Lord Mansfield, Mr. Justice Willes, and, above all, Mr. Justice Aston, uttered masterpieces of learning, wisdom, close reasoning, and common sense, that the instructors of youth in Harvard, Oxford, &c., would do well to rescue from their dusty niche, and make them teachers of logic, law, and morals, in universities and schools. They built on all the rocks: 1st, on the voice of conscience; on Meum and Tuum; on the sanctity of productive labour; on the title of labourer A to the fruits of A's labour, and the prima facie absence of a title in B to the fruits of A's labour without a just equivalent. 2nd, on the universal admission that an author alone has a right to print his written words, and on the legal consequence that by exercising this sole right and creating a large material property under it, he keeps the right alive, not dissolves it, since common law abhors divestiture of an admitted right, and loss of property created by invitation of law.

From these principles they went, 3rdly, to special evidence, and traced the history of the exclusive right to print published books; showed it at a remote period called by the very technical and legal name the statute adopted centuries later; proved the recognition of this right by name in proclamations and decrees, and Republican ordinances, and three parliamentary licensing Acts under three different Sovereigns prior to Queen Anne's statute; the entire absence of dissent in the old judges, and their uniform concurrence when speak they did; their dicta in re, and their obiter dicta—as that “the statute of Charles II. did not give the right (copyright), but the action:” and “of making title to a copyright,” and of “a copy” being a property paramount to the King's grant, and so on—and then they cited law cases in a series, beginning with “Roper v. Streater,” long before the statute, and continued in equity long after the statute upon titles created long before the statute, as “Eyre v. Walker,” where the assignment of the copyright was in writing dated 1657, and “Tonson v. Walker,” where the assignment (Milton's “Paradise Lost”) was dated 1667: “Motte v. Falkner,” &c. They also cited the preamble, or historical preface, of the statute itself, and other matters. This reveals the Baconian method, and the true legal method, which goes by principles resting on large induction, and applicable to all citizens, impartially; and by the best direct evidence accessible. Against the Washerwoman's theory they cited “Pope v. Curl,” and “Queensberry v. Shebbeare.” Judge Yates accepted, though rather sullenly, “Pope v. Curl,” and “Queensberry v. Shebbeare,” and, in stating his own theory, forswore the washerwoman. He admitted that, before the statute, if any person printed an author's words without his express consent to print them, he acted unlawfully, although he came by them by legal means, as by loan or devolution. The word “devolution” he used expressly to keep within "Queensberry v. Shebbeare" (4 Burroughs, 2379).

But from that point he parted company with the judges and the jury, and undertook to prove, out of the depths of his inner consciousness, that the incorporeal right, which in "Queensberry v. Shebbeare," prevailed against sixty years' lawful possession of a written copy, could not possibly have continued against five minutes' lawful possession of a printed copy:—(risum teneatis, amici.)

Yates.—"Goods must be capable of possession, and have some visible substance: for, without that, nothing is capable of actual possession." "Nothing can be an object of property which has not a corporeal substance," &c. This proposition repeated about six times.

"The author's unpublished manuscript is corporeal. But after publication by the true proprietor, the mere intellectual ideas in a book are totally incorporeal, and therefore incapable of any distinct separate possession; they can neither be "seized, forfeited, nor possessed, &c.," and this discovery he repeated often, and rang the changes. "Can the sentiments themselves, apart from the paper, be taken in execution for a debt? In case of treason, can they be forfeited? If they cannot be seized, the sole right of publishing them cannot be confined to the author. There can be no property where there can be no forfeiture," &c., &c.

Behold the lunatic in the second degree! His senses, if he had not been out of them, revealed that copyright in printed books existed by law while he spoke, and yet that ideas were incorporeal, and could not be seized nor forfeited; nor the sentiments taken in execution. The nature of ideas throughout creation was the same before and after Queen Anne's little trumpery statute; yet here is a lunatic in the second degree, who either says Queen Anne's Parliament had repealed God Almighty in this particular, or says nothing at all; for the sole point in dispute is, Did copyright in printed books exist amongst English human beings, before Queen Anne's statute, as it did amongst French human beings, before any special enactment—or did it exist in written works only? Who but a lunatic in the second degree cannot see that the sole right of printing unpublished ideas, is the very same property in the ideas as the sole right of reprinting the same ideas, and that all publication can do is to let in another claimant to the right of printing, viz., the public purchaser.

As to all his "galimatias" that there can be no property detached from a visible substance—the fool has gone and blundered into THE WASHERWOMAN'S THEORY, and blundered out of the insane sophist's. The insane sophist began with disowning the washerwoman. She, poor wretch, is contradicted not only by "Roper v. Streater," but by "Queensberry v. Shebbeare," and "Pope v. Curl," the cases Yates admits. But Lord Mansfield collared the insane sophist and would-be washerwoman on this, and literally pulverized his washerwoman's twaddle, with fifteen sledge-hammer sentences beginning thus:—"It has all along been expressly admitted," and ending "under a commission of bankruptcy."

I do not cite the pulverizing paragraphs, because there is no need. Yates's attempt to smuggle in the washerwoman's theory under the insane sophist's, is self-evident, and has failed utterly; for to "Pope v. Curl," and "Queensberry v. Shebbeare," are since added "Macklin v. Richardson," and "Palmer v. De Witt," both death-blows to the washerwoman's theory. Palmer v. De Witt.—Robertson, English dramatist, wrote a comedy, "Caste," and played it all over England, but did not publish. He assigned the copyright, and stage-right, at common law, to Palmer, an American citizen. De Witt published "Caste" in New York. Palmer sued him, and the case was settled, by judgment for Palmer, who was, in law, the English author. (New York Court of Appeals, Feb. 27, 1872.) The judgment lies before me. There was no violation whatever of the manuscript. Nothing was misappropriated but the naked right to print and publish a composition, to which enormous publicity has been given by twenty prompt copies and fifty sets of parts, and representation in fifty theatres at least. Therefore this American Court of very high authority has gone with Lord Mansfield, and other great lawyers, and swept the very mainstay of Judge Yates's sophistry away for ever.

This narrows the question to forfeiture, or non-forfeiture, by publication, of copyright at common law. Now this soi-disant forfeiture, Queen Anne's Parliament treat, in the preamble, or historical prelude, as a malpractice, a violation of property; they say it is unjust—cruel—and new; which is pre-statutory evidence in the statute itself. Yates gives Queen Anne's Parliament the lie, and undertakes to prove, out of the depths of his inner consciousness, that this malpractice was—at the very moment when Parliament denounced it, and prepared, in imitation of preceding Acts, to punish it as a misdemeanour—just, reasonable, and old. Having set this very Parliament above the Creator, he now sets it below Yates. However, his argument runs thus: he says that we authors put forward ideas and sentiments, as the direct object of property at common law in old times, and insult common sense and justice in pretending that we could publish our ideas, yet reserve the right of printing those ideas for publication. This is plausible, and paves the way for his romantic phrases that have intoxicated ordinary minds, such as “the act of publication, when voluntarily done by the author himself, is virtually and necessarily a gift to the public.” Then handling it no longer as a donation but under the head of implied contracts, which is a much sounder view of the author’s sale to the public purchaser, he says, neatly enough, the seller delivers it without restriction, and the buyer receives it without stipulation. Then he jumps to this droll inference:—“Nothing less than legislative power can restrain the use of anything.” This, however, is a purely chimerical distinction; the common law was founded partly on Royal statutes, largely conceived, and resembling maxims; and limited uses are not altogether unknown to it; every river is a highway, over which the public can pass, and even bathe in it; without infringing property; but not always fish; and a right of way obtained by use, or leased to the churchwardens, under which the public can lead its cow across a freeholder’s field, gives no right to graze her upon the path; and, if I let the public into my tea-garden at sixpence a head to eat all the fruit they can, no express stipulation is required to reserve the fruit trees. Moreover, Yates’s position is too wide; it lets in other nations; now the French and Dutch common law give it the lie direct in copyright itself; so, if we must reason a priori, the chances are fifty to one the English common law gave it the lie too.

But this is our direct reply—for the multiplying power of the press is so unique, it excludes all close comparisons—so far from claiming a property in ideas, that is the very thing the holders of copyright at common law did not claim. That is the claim of the patentees alone, as I shall show in the proper place.

So far from ideas becoming incorporeal after publication,

&c., which statement of Yates' is a "galimatias," and an idiotic confusion; ideas are incorporeal only at a period long antecedent to publication—viz. while they lie in the author's mind.

An author connects his ideas with matter once, and for ever, when he embodies them in a laboured sequence of words marked by his hand on paper. These written words are matter, by collocation, laboured sequence, and the physical strokes of a pen with a black unguent; matter, as distinct from the paper as gas is from the pipe, and, though they convey mental ideas, the written words themselves are not so fine a material as gas, which yet is measured and sold by the foot. The phrase "intellectual labour" is an équivoque and a snare that has deluded ten thousand minds. It applies somewhat loosely to study; but an author's productive labour is only one species of skilled labour; it is physical, plus intellectual, labour, and those compositions which led to common-law rights were the result of long, keen labour, intellectual and physical, proved to be physical by the vast time occupied—whereas thought is instantaneous—and by shortening the life of the author's body, through its effects on the blood-vessels of the brain, which are a part, not of the mind but of the body. The said vessels get worn by an author's productive labour, and give way. This, even in our short experience, has killed Dickens, Thackeray, and perhaps Lytton. The short life of authors in general is established by statistics. See Neison's "Vital Statistics."

The words are the material vehicle of the ideas; the paper is the material vehicle of the words.

The author has, by admission of Yates, the sole right to do as follows, and does it:—He takes the written words, which are the vehicle of his ideas, to the printing compositor, and the compositor takes printed letters identical with the author's, though differing a little in shape—but that is a mere incident of the day; in the infancy of printing they were identical in shape, only worse formed—he sets the letters in forms, and passes them to the pressman. For this the compositor charges say £28. With the pressman, and not with the compositor, who is a copyist for the Press, begins the Press. Now comes the mechanical miracle which made copyright necessary and inevitable; the Press can apply different sheets to the same metal letters conveying the composition; thus a thousand different paper volumes are created in which the letters and the author's composition are one, but the volumes of paper a thousand. The volumes are now ready, but not issued: and I beg particular attention to the author's admitted position at common law one moment before publication. He has still, by law (Yates assenting), the sole right to print, and publish; he has created, for sale, a thousand volumes, under an exclusive legal right to create volumes for sale: he has added to his original legal right three equities:—1st, priority of printing, which is nothing against a legal title, but something against a rhapsodical title; 2nd, the peculiar expense of setting up type from written words; 3rd, occupancy; and the equitable right to sell again the thousand volumes, a large material property created under an exclusive legal title founded on morality and universal law, and conceded by Judge Yates. For the force of occupancy added to title, see Law, passim; and for the force of the above special equity, see "Sweet v. Cator."

Well, the man in possession of the legal right, and also of the additional equities, and also of the material volumes, now does a proper and rational act, by which the public profits confessedly, an act such as no man was ever lawfully punished for; he publishes, or sets in circulation, his one composition contained in many paper vehicles. He sells each volume say for six shillings to the trade, eight shillings to the public reader. What he intends to sell to the public reader for eight shillings, is—paper and binding, two shillings; printers' work, sixpence; useful or entertaining knowledge, alias his own labour, four shillings; the right of using the ideas in many ways, of even plagiarizing and printing them re-worded, and also the right of selling again the very thing the purchaser bought—the one material volume with its mental contents. Prima facie, the contract, so understood, is not an unjust one to the buyer, nor an extortionate one for the seller. His profit, on these terms, does not approach the retail trader's, who, in practice, is the seller to the public, yet forfeits nothing by the sale. Now it is a maxim of the common law, that where two interpretations of a contract, express or implied, are possible, one that gives no great advantage to either party, and the other that gives a monstrous advantage to one party, the fairer interpretation is to be preferred, since men, meeting in business, are presumed by the law to exchange equivalents: and this rule, established by cases, applies especially where a whole class of contracts is to be interpreted. Please observe that the ground I am upon, viz. of implied contracts, was selected by Yates, and I ask which interpretation, Yates's or ours, agrees with the undisputed common-law doctrine of equivalents?

The purchase of books is a lottery. But there are a host of prizes. Lord Bacon's works gave the public purchaser a great deal more than a thousand million pounds' worth of knowledge and power; yet he made no extra charge to justify a claim on his copyright founded on purchase of his volumes. The great books balance the little: and the buyer has the choice. Colonel Gardiner was converted in an afternoon, from vicious courses, not by a vision, but a duodecimo; and that is a fact attested by Jupiter Carlyle.—I didn't find it in my intestines, where Yates looks for facts. Many men, about the very time of "Millar v. Taylor," ascribed the salvation of their souls to a copy of Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul." If a pupil of Yates, before purchase of Doddridge, that would be a great improvement in a reader's prospects—for 8s. Besides, after he has been converted from Yates's reading of the 8th of Anne, to Doddridge's reading of the 8th of Moses, and his soul saved, &c., he can lend or sell the volume. Then why pillage Doddridge for un-Yatesing him, and saving his soul dirt cheap? Find me the party to any other contract, who can eat his cake, yet sell it afterwards, like the honest purchaser of a good volume.

CHARLES READE.

EIGHTH LETTER.

SIR,—The next intellectual article the insane sophist opposes to evidence is vituperation, or mendacity trading upon popular prejudice. "It is a monopoly opposed to the great laws of property," &c., repeated ten times. Now gauge his logic. He says: 1. The sole right of printing a man's own composition is a perpetual property at common law. 2. If the proprietor exerts that perpetual right lawfully, to the benefit of himself and the community, and law, mistaking him for a felon, divests him of it, the good citizen forfeits his property. 3. If law declines to abjure its abhorrence of forfeitures, and does not divest him of his sacred property, the sacred property becomes monopoly. How? by bare retention? by non-forfeiture? by continuation? Did ever continuation or non-forfeiture of a property metamorphose that property into a monopoly? So then if my hen and her chickens run upon a common, and law, having imbibed a spite against feathered property, lets the public in to scramble for them, I can scramble with the lot, but lose my property in my hen and chickens. But if law declares they are mine still, though my blind confidence has made it very easy to pirate them, then my property in my hen and my chickens becomes a monopoly—which word means the sole right to sell any hens or any chickens whatever. Is this a lunatic, or a liar?—or both?

I have no theory of my own about monopoly. I merely apply settled truths that idiots repeat like cuckoos but cannot apply. Monopoly is defined in the law books, and justly defined, to be “an exclusive right to sell any species of merchandise”—“genus quoddam mercaturæ.”

Property is a wider right over a narrower object. It is the sole right of keeping, destroying, leasing, or selling, not a species of merchandise, but only that individual specimen of merchandise, or those individual specimens, which happen to be the man's own by law. One well-known historical feature of monopoly is that it was the creature of Royal prerogative; another that it has always clashed in trade with undoubted property. In this kingdom are now no literary monopolies, but there is one dramatic monopoly, viz. the exclusive right of the licensed managers to represent any play whatever—yours, mine, or theirs (6 and 7 Victoria). But literary monopolies infested the ages Anachronist Yates misrepresents; and those men of the common law he underrates—and they were great masters of logic compared with him—always called them by their right name, “Patents.” Under Henry VIII., one Saxton had the sole right to sell printed maps and charts, and, under Elizabeth, Tallis and Bird, to sell music. Both were vetoes on a species—nature, monopoly—name, a patent—root, prerogative. The owners of copyright groaned publicly, again and again, under these infractions of their property by prerogative patents; and, after the second revolution, when prerogative was staggering under repeated blows, literary property, or copyright, took a literary patent or monopoly boldly by the throat, in “Roper v. Streater.”

Streeter, law patentee, had, from the Crown, the sole right to sell law reports by whomsoever written. This was monopoly—an exclusive right to sell a species of literary composition. Roper bought of Judge Croke's executor the copyright or sole right to reprint Judge Croke's reports, and line his trunk with them or sell them—which is property.

And this muddle-head Yates could look with his moon-calf's eye at "Roper v. Streeter," yet call literary property in a man's own (by purchase) printed composition, a monopoly, even when he saw literary monopoly and literary property cheek by jowl in a court of law—fighting each other as rival suitors—and the monopoly in a species of books declaring its nature, its distinctive title, "patent," and its root in prerogative; and the literary property declaring its nature, its distinctive title, copyright, and its root in common law. So that, in "Roper v. Streeter," the plaintiff gives Yates the lie on behalf of property; the defendant gives him the lie on behalf of monopoly; and the judges give him the lie in the name of the common law, when he calls copyright in a man's own printed book "a monopoly contrary to the great laws of property." In my very first letter I offered the statesmen and lawyers Yates has gulled with this fallacy a bet of £150 to £50 a man's copyright in his own printed book is property, and not monopoly; yet of all the men who are so ready to swindle authors at home and abroad out of a million pounds by means of this pettifogger's lie, not one has had the honesty nor the manhood to risk £50 of his own against £150 of an author's, upon the lie. I hope the world will see through this, and loathe it, and despise it, as I do.

To sum up the bag of moonshine.—To any man who has read history at its sources, as Mansfield and Blackstone did, Yates's whole picture of old England is like an historical novel written by an unlettered girl. She undertakes, like him, to present antiquity; and what she does portray is the little bit of her own age she has picked up, its thoughts and phrases. Under the Tudors and the Stuarts her characters are impregnated with modern views of liberty, and rhapsodize accordingly: they have even a smattering of "political economy" and let you know it; and they say "the Sabbath"—"illusions"—"developments"—"to burke an inquiry"—"the fact of my being so and so," meaning "the circumstance of my being so and so,"—and her counsel address the jury for a criminal, and you may thank your stars if Lady Jane Grey does not lay down her Longinus (of whom there was not a copy in the kingdom) and waltz with the Spanish Ambassador. The sentiments and the phrases Judge Yates ascribes to men under the Tudors, the Stuarts, the Commonwealth, and the Dutchman, are all pure anachronisms, quite as barefaced to any scholar as those in a virgin's novel. Old England never personified "the public," as Yates fancies it did, and "Fur Publicola," or the patriot thief of copyright, was yet unborn. The men who built seven gables to one house, and breakfasted on ale, had no such extravagant anticipations of liberty as to despoil private property in its sacred name. Indeed "copy" was a word oftener used than "liberty," under James I., and even when liberty began to struggle, it was against power in high places, not property in low ones. It cut down prerogatives; it did not run away with fig-trees because the proprietor sold it the figs. The tall talk, the bombastical mendacity, "publication of a volume being a gift of the copyright to the public"—"a property in ideas," &c., all this rhapsodical rubbish emanated from romantic pettifoggers, gilding theft, at a known date—namely, between 1740 and 1765, and the ideas were not a month older than the varnish, for they were all invented, not by judges, but by counsel for the defence of post-statutory piracies. Find me this slip-slop defiling the mouths of the old judges.

So much for à priori reasoning against evidence. What else was to be expected? The system of reasoning that kept the world dark for ages, it would be odd indeed if that system could not darken a single subject, and turn so small a thing as a pettifogging judge into so common a thing as a lunatic.

THE BACONIAN METHOD v. THE METHOD OF THE DARK AGES.

Evidence on one line may mislead: but concurrent evidence—never. By concurrent evidence I mean veins of evidence starting from different points, but converging to one centre. Three distinct coincidences pointing to one man as a murderer, have always hanged him in my day. I have many examples noted. Almost the greatest concurrence of heterogeneous evidence on any historical fact whatever, is that which proves copyright at law in printed books before Queen Anne; which also proves an Englishman has full copyright in the United States.

First let me ask—What is A WORD? The insane sophists seem to fancy it is a thing, or else air. It is neither. It is defined, and justly, by the logicians, "the current sign of an established thing." It can never precede the thing signified. We all know the word-making process; for we have all seen it. There was no word more wanted than "telegram," yet it was not coined till years after the thing signified. I saw the verb "to burke" created. It was coined about six months after Burke, who smothered folk for the anatomists, was hung; but it took years to penetrate the kingdom. When a word gets to be used by different classes, governing and governed, that is the voice of the nation, and its currency shows the thing to be full-blown and long-established. It is simply idiotic to look, with moon-calf eye, at an ancient popular word, and bay the moon with conjectures that no ancient thing was signified.

Heads of the evidence against forfeiture of copyright by publication.

1. The word "copy" from the Tudor Princes to Queen Anne's statute, and in the statute, and after the statute, always used to signify the sole right of printing before and after publication. That alone bars Yates's theory that publication dissolves the property.

2. The ancient use of this technical word in disconnected things and places, yet always to denote property and occupation. Example A.—Entries of sales and transfers of copyright, from 1558 to 1709, at Stationers' Hall, by occupiers. Proviso in 1582 that, where the King had licensed any individual to print, the licence should nevertheless be void, if the copyright belonged to another. B.—Recognition of "copy" as property in Acts of the Star Chamber, and Republican ordinances, both valid as historical evidence, and in the licensing Acts of Parliament 13 and 14 Charles II., 1 James II., c. 7, 4 William and Mary, c. 24, which are evidence, and something more, since, in all these, Royal Parliaments, having the same powers as Queen Anne's, protected, by severe penalties, that very property at law in published books which Yates divines out of his inside had expired by publication. Either these licensing Acts were copyright Acts—which is absurd—or they protected copyright as it existed for ever at common law. Here "copy," or "copyright," might very well imitate Des Cartes, and say, "PROTEGOR; ERGO SUM." C.—Use of the old word "copy," in Queen Anne's statute. The first statute on any matter is written under the common law. Even this truism has escaped the babblers on copyright. In Queen Anne's

Act, the word "copy" is used six times in its common-law sense; and it is first applied, viz. in sect. 1, not to manuscripts on the eve of publication, but to printed books; and the preference antiquity had for the printed book over the MS. is here continued; twenty-one years the minimum term to a published book, fourteen to a MS. on the eve of publication. Is that how Yates talks about the MS. and the book? D.—Recognition of the word, and thing, in business. Public and notorious sales of ancient copyrights, some of them famous: "The Whole Duty of Man;" Dryden's copyrights, both dramatic, and epic; Milton's, Southern's, Rowe's, and some of Defoe's, Swift's, and Addison's. E.—Several assignments of "copy" for ever, that now survive only in the verdict of the jury, "Millar v. Taylor." A vast number drawn after the statute upon the perpetual common-law right: one, referred to in a former letter, survives in print, "George Barnwell," ed. 1810. F.—The use of the word "by lawyers" in these pre-statutory agreements, also in the declaration "Ponder v. Brady," an action on the case brought for piratical printing of "The Pilgrim's Progress," "of which"—so runs the plaint—"the plaintiff was, and is, the true proprietor; whereby he lost the profit and benefit of his 'copy.'" This brief and technical statement of the grievance is not like a pleader groping his way by periphrasis to a doubtful right. The pleader is on a beaten track.

3. The terms on which Milton leased the copy of "Paradise Lost" to Simmons, in 1667. £5 for the first edition, £5 for the second edition, £5 for the third. (See Todd's "Life of Milton.") This contradicts Yates, and his theory of forfeiture by publication, as precisely as A can contradict B in advance. When the liar speaks first, true men can fit the contradiction to the lie, in terms; but, when the honest men speak first, the liar can evade their direct grip, by choice of terms; for he has the last word. Put yourself in the place of Simmons; if you were a publisher, and publication forfeited copyright, would you agree to give an author the very same sum for the second edition, and the third, as for the first? I am quite content to refer Simmons's treaty with Milton to Messrs. Harper and Co., Messrs. Osgood, Ticknor and Co., Messrs. Appleton and Co., Messrs. Sheldon and Co., New York publishers. They shall decide between Yates and me. Mr. Justice Yates says Simmons's was an agreement with Milton, under the common law, for the mere sale of early sheets, and I say Mr. Justice Yates is a romancer. Now multiply this evidence by a hundred. We only know this business (Milton and Simmons) through the accidental celebrity of the book; but the jury, in 1769, had a pile of examples before them.

4. The subsequent history of "Paradise Lost." Paid by Simmons to John Milton £5 in 1667. In 1669, £5 for the second edition. In 1674, £5 for the third edition, paid to Milton's widow. In 1680, sale of the copyright, for £8, Dame Milton to Simmons. Simmons, in two years, sold the copyright to Aylmer for £25: and Aylmer, 1683, sold half to Tonson, and, in 1690, the other half, for a considerable sum. Soon after that a vast public sale set in; yet Tonson held the copyright undisturbed. The temptation was strong: but so was the common law. It was never pirated till 1739, seventy-two years after first publication. It was no sooner pirated than Tonson moved the court. It had no protection under the Act. That protection expired in 1731. A judge, who was a ripe lawyer before Queen Anne's statute, and knew the precedent common-law right, restrained the piracy at once under the common law, "Tonson v. Walker."

Legal History—1667-1710, protected by common law alone, and never pirated. 1710-1731, protected by common law and statute. 1732 to 1774, by common law only. Protected by injunction, 1739, and again in 1751.

5. The verdict of the special jury in "Millar v. Taylor." They were not men blinded by any preconceived notion; they were twelve men of the world; they sifted the evidence, and found disjunctively that it was "usual, before Queen Anne, to purchase from authors perpetual copyrights, and to assign the same from hand to hand, and to make them the subject of family settlements:" all those disjunctive findings are equally good against the public claimant, unless Yates can prove it was also the custom before Queen Anne to settle Bagshot-heath, and Wimbledon-common, and ten turnpike roads upon son Dick, with a mortgage to nephew Tom, and a remainder to cousin Sal. His legal objection that custom short of immemorial cannot make a legal title is specious. But he forgets; the root of our title is not in anything so short as what lawyers call immemorial custom. Our title is acquired by productive labour, and is personal property—a legal right six times as old as the British nation. The narrow question of fact the jury dealt with was this—was it usual for the act of publication to dissolve in one moment the perpetual right Judge Yates admits, a right acquired not by custom, if you please, but by productive labour and universal law? For its modest office of interpreter of law, applied to so narrow a matter as non-forfeiture of an admitted right, the custom of two hundred years (solidified by a law case or two), and contradicted by no elder nor concurrent custom, is more than sufficient—"consuetudo interpret legum." The special jury were educated men; impartial men; sworn men; many men; unanimous men; Yates was one unsworn man, with a bee in his bonnet. The twelve jurors were the constitutional tribunal, chosen of old by the Kingdom, and still chosen by the great Republic to try such issues. The one Yates was, as respects this issue, an unconstitutional tribunal appointed by himself, and no more sworn to try that issue than Dr. Kenealy was sworn to try the issues in the "Queen v. Baker."

The verdict of that jury is law; and the usage of the kingdom for ages before Queen Anne is proved to be non-forfeiture by publication, and proved on evidence since dispersed; and therefore PROVED TO THE END OF TIME.

6. The preamble of the statute. This is pre-statutory evidence, and Yates says it accords with his views. The reader shall judge. I will draw a preamble honestly embodying his views—as every candid mind shall own—and I will place it cheek by jowl with Queen Anne's prelude.

PREAMBLE À LA YATES.

Whereas, for the greater encouragement of writers and other learned men, to produce laborious and useful books of lasting benefit to mankind, it is expedient to restrict, for certain times, and under certain conditions, that just liberty, which the subjects of this realm have hitherto enjoyed, of reprinting and publishing all such works as by publication have become common property; be it enacted, &c.

PREAMBLE OF THE ACT 8TH ANNE.

Whereas printers, booksellers, and other persons, have of late frequently taken the liberty of printing, reprinting, and publishing, books, and other writings, without the consent of the authors, or proprietors, of such books and writings, to their very great detriment and too often to the ruin of them and their families; for preventing therefore such practices for the future, be it enacted, &c.

I make no comment. I but invite ripe men to inspect this as intelligently as girls do Sir Octopus. Eyes and no eyes have muddled copyright long enough.

7. Law cases. A.—"Roper v. Streater," King's Bench. Alias copyright, or literary property, v. monopoly.

Judgment of the whole Bench for copyright at law against monopoly and prerogative.

B.—“Roper v. Streater.” House of Lords.

The Lords admitted perpetual copyright at law, but declared the King had a paymaster's claim to Judge Croke's reports because he paid the judges and acquired a copyright in their decisions. Thus they smuggled him in as proprietor at common law. Yates's theory of forfeiture by publication never occurred to the mind of any judge, either in the King's Bench or the House of Lords.

C.—The injunctions soon after the statute. Here there are two things to be considered. 1st. A judge does not roll out of his cradle on to the woolsack. Sir Joseph Jekyl was a ripe lawyer in 1700, when “Roper v. Streater” was tried in the Lords. He saw the common-law right long before the statute, and went by it after the statute, and against the literal words of the statute; for they affix a term, and so could never suggest a new perpetual right. In 1735 he restrained a piracy on “The Whole Duty of Man,” published in 1657 (“Eyre v. Walker.”)

2nd. In those days an injunction really meant “an injunction to stay waste of some property not disputable at law.” Where there was a shadow of doubt at Westminster no equity judge would ever grant an injunction. This is notorious. Consequently the injunctions granted on the perpetual common-law right, by judges so timid, are evidence not only of their own adhesion to the perpetual common-law right, but proofs that all the contemporary judges at Westminster concurred tacitly. Agreeably to this Lord Mansfield distinctly declares that the first doubt, which ever arose about the perpetual right, was in “Tonson v. Collins,” and the Court of Chancery, on hearing a mere whisper of that doubt down at Westminster, instantly refused the injunction, because of the doubt, though they did not share it. I myself know from quite another source that they even suspended their proceedings in “Macklin v. Richardson” because “Millar v. Taylor” was pending in the King's Bench. Therefore the chain of injunctions they granted between 1735 and 1751, on the perpetual common-law right, were post-statutory acts by pre-statutory minds representing the whole judicial opinion of the nation before and after the statute.

8. Admissions.—This is the highest kind of evidence. A.—Milton attacked a parliamentary licensing Act with great spirit. When a man falls upon a measure in the heat of controversy he is seldom nice. Yet this polemic and great enthusiast for liberty drew the rein at private property, and solemnly approved the constitutional clause in the Act, the severe protection of copyright. B.—The petitioners to Parliament in 1703. It was their interest to make a strong case for parliamentary interference. Yet they admitted they had an action on the case against pirates, and had no fears of a verdict; but could not get sufficient damages, nor enforce them, because the pirates were paupers. The force of this unwilling evidence has never been justly appreciated.

C.—A Legal Phenomenon.—Judge Yates had a peck at several minor cases, but never once, in a discourse that lasted three hours, did he dare to touch "Roper v. Streeter," either in the King's Bench or the House of Lords. Now when a lawyer dare not call his own principal witness, we all know fact is dead against him; and, when he affects to ignore the leading case against him, that means he cannot get over the law of that case, and knows it. Of course a more honest judge would have faced it, and either got over it, or else given in to it. Indeed, there is no other recorded instance in which a dissentient puisne judge ever shirked the leading case relied on by the chief of his court and the other puisnes in any case so fully reported as "Millar v. Taylor." It is phenomenal. Every practical lawyer knows in his heart what it means, and it is a game that only pays with dull or inexperienced men. To us, who know courts of law, and the tact of counsel in gliding, with a face of vituline innocence, over what they cannot encounter, it is but shallow art; for it blows the gaff; and the critic goes at once to the ignored case, to see why it was ignored. Well, Yates ignored "Roper v. Streeter" because he wanted people to believe two infernal falsehoods—(1) that perpetual copyright at law in printed books did not exist before Queen Anne, and (2) that, had it existed, it would have been a monopoly opposed to property. Now, in both these particulars, Roper, or property, gave him the lie—Streeter, or monopoly, gave him the lie—and all the judges, in both courts, gave him the lie. That is why he evaded "Roper v. Streeter," and the unprecedented evasion is evidence that he knew it smashed him.

Thus "Palmer v. De Witt," and the other cases, backed by common sense and universal law, prove a man's perpetual incorporeal property in the fruit of his own skilled labour.

That law, deviating from all its habits, divested a man of so sacred a right because he exercised it, is a chimera supported only by à priori reasoning and romantic phrases born about 1750, and unknown to the old judges. First we answer a fool according to his folly, and pull his chimera to pieces. Then we answer him not according to his folly, but on the great Baconian method. And now this is clear; either Bacon was an idiot, or Yates was an idiot. We prefer Bacon, and to go, in a matter of fact, by the general usage, and the sense of the old kingdom, sworn to on evidence by a jury, and confirmed and solidified by a chain of reported law cases, beginning before the statute and continuing by the force of common law after the statute, in a perfect catena; also the obiter dicta of the old judges, and their dicta ad rem, all which heterogeneous evidence is "uncontradicted by any usage, book, judgment, or saying." Teste Lord Mansfield. So then "Robertson v. De Witt" and the complete proof supra of non-forfeiture by publication at common law give us copyright in printed books in the United States. We claim it from the judges at Washington, should we be driven to fight it in that form, and meantime we appeal to their consciences to back us with the Legislature of their country. For, if Robertson, making twenty copies of "Caste," and fifty sets of parts, which is multiplication of copies in a way of trade, and handing the parts to two hundred different actors—a reading public—and delivering the words for money to about a million spectators who pay, cannot by the common law be pillaged of his sole right to print and publish, what a farce it is to pretend on grounds of common law that another British writer, for publishing a book and selling one hundred copies in Great Britain, can be lawfully despoiled in the United States of his sole right, in spite of Blackstone and Mansfield, and on the ground of a mere variation in the mode of publicity and the way of selling. By such reasoning law is divorced from common sense and from all ancient interpretation and usage, and from even the shadow of morality. Now law exists, not for the sake of law, but of morality.

CHARLES READE.

NINTH LETTER.

SIR,—The power of judges is often crippled by precedents, that revolt their consciences and their sense; but a Legislature is happier; the justice it sees, that it can do. Now, when literary property was first seriously discussed in the States, the question whether copyright is a property or a monopoly, a natural right or a creature of prerogative, had just been discussed in England, and the Legislature of Massachusetts read "Millar v. Taylor" and "Donaldson v. Becket," and decided between the dwarf sophist Yates, and the great lawyer Mansfield, in very clear terms. I beg particular attention to this, that Justice Yates pointed to the title of Queen Anne's statute, as "an Act for the encouragement of learning, by vesting the copies (copyrights) of printed books in the authors or purchasers," and said very fairly that the term "vested" implied that the right did not exist before, in the opinion of Parliament. To this Lord Mansfield replied that the title of an Act is no part of an Act; and that in the body of the Act the word "to vest" is not used, but the word "to secure," and that the preamble would decide the question, even if a title could be cited against the body of an Act, for the preamble is full and clear in its recognition of the then existing property.

In March, 1783, the Legislature of Massachusetts gave judgment on this question of title v. body and preamble, as precisely as if Mansfield and Yates had referred it to them. They passed their first Copyright Act under this title—"An Act for the purpose of securing to authors the exclusive right and benefit of publishing their literary productions for twenty-one years." Having elected between "vest" and "secure" in their title, they passed to the second point; and, to leave no shadow of a doubt as to their views, drew such a preamble, as even Mr. Justice Yates, who affects to misunderstand Queen Anne's preamble, could hardly twist from its meaning; and I shall be grateful to any American critic, who will do American and English authors so much justice as to inspect the comparative preambles I put together in my last and compare both with this which I now cite:—

"Whereas the improvement of knowledge, the progress of civilisation, the public weal of the community, and the advancement of human happiness, greatly depend on the efforts of learned and ingenious persons in the various arts and sciences: As the principal encouragement such persons can have to make great and beneficial exertions of this nature must depend on the legal security of the fruits of their study and industry to themselves; and, as such security is one of the natural rights of all men, there being no property more peculiarly a man's own than that which is produced by the labour of his mind, therefore to encourage learned and ingenious persons to write useful books for the benefit of mankind, Be it enacted," &c. 1 Mass. Laws, 94, ed. 1801.

The other States followed this example and these sentiments; all avoid the word "vest" and employ the word "secure," and all, or most of them, recognise the security of an author's property as "a right perfectly agreeable to the principles of natural justice and equity." See the excellent work on copyright of G. T. Curtis, an American jurist, p. 77.

The very idea of "monopoly" is absent from all these Acts; they emanated from men, who were lovers of liberty and constitutional rights, and had shown how well they could fight for them; whereas canting Camden illustrated his peculiar views of the common law by not uttering one word of objection in the House of Lords to a parliamentary tax upon the Colonies for the benefit of England; an usurpation it would be as difficult to find in the law of England as it is easy to find copyright there.

From these sound principles of justice and national policy the Legislature of the United States has fallen away, and listened this many years to cant, and the short-sighted greed of a Venetian oligarchy sticking like a fungus on the fair trunk of the Republican tree. But I dare say not one member of Congress knows how unjust and unwise is the present state of statute law, as regards British and American authors. It is not only injustice we writhe under, but bitter, and biting, and inconsistent partiality.

Even little lawyers, though their mental vision is too weak to see the essential difference between patent-right and copyright, have a sort of confused notion that copyright is a trifle more sacred, and consistent with common law, than the various and distinct monopolies, just and unjust, which the narrow vocabulary of law huddles together under the term patent-right. Yet, in this great and enlightened Republic, international copyright and stage-right, by statute, are refused, and international patent-right established.

The distinction is a masterpiece of partiality, immorality, and inconsistency. The patent on new substances discovered or imported is a monstrous, unconstitutional restraint of just liberty, and will be abolished whenever Legislature rises to a science. The patent of invention is salutary. It is the exclusive right to carry out and embody, by skilled labour, one or two bare and fleshless ideas, but sometimes of prodigious value to the world : oftener, of course, not worth a button.

The patent of invention is a mild monopoly in a species or sub-species of ideas ; but copyright in bare ideas does not exist. Copyright cannot arise until the bare and fleshless ideas of the author, infinitely more numerous than a patentee's, have been united with matter, and wrought out by the mental and physical labour of the writer, which physical labour accelerates the death of his body. An author's physical posture, when at work, is the same as a printing compositor's physical posture—see the famous portrait of Dickens at work—and his physical labour is similar, and equally bad for the body, whereas thinking and sweating at the same time are healthy. The author does the intellectual and physical labour not only of the architect or the mechanical inventor, but also of the builder or of the skilled constructor, and his written manuscript corresponds not with the specification of a patent, or the plan of a house, but with the wrought article, and the built house. The printing press adds nothing to the author's production ; it does not even alter the vehicles, but only improves them, and that only of late years, since running hand. The modern manuscript is paper with a certain laborious sequence of words marked on it in ink by skilled labour ; the book is paper with the same laborious sequence of words marked on it by mere mechanical labour taking little time. Let A read from the manuscript and B from the book, and both readers deliver the same complete production, corresponding with the patented or patentable article, not with the bare specification.

This object of property, the author's material web of words, has not, in itself, the value of a patentable article. Its value lies in its unique power of self-reproduction by means of the actor or the press. Mechanical articles of very moderate value are more valuable per se than any author's MS., but mechanical articles have no power of self-reproduction. There is no magic machine with which three quiet idiots, without an atom of constructive skill, can reproduce steam-engines, power presses, and sewing machines. But three quiet idiots, with the printing press, can, without one grain of the original author's peculiar art, skill, and labour, reproduce exactly his whole composition, and can rob him of the entire value in his object of property, because, without the sole right of printing, his object of property has not the value of a deal shaving, whereas an article that might be patented, but is not, is worth ninety-two per cent. of the same article patented.

Thus the American Legislature outlaws the complete, executed, wrought out property of a Briton, and protects his inchoate monopoly or exclusive right to go and work upon certain bare intellectual ideas, provided they are bare ideas applicable to mechanics.

Take this specification to a Patent Office. "I have invented a young man and two sisters in love with him. They were amiable till he came, but now they undermine each other to get the young man; and they reveal such faults that he marries an artful jade who praised everybody."

You apply for a patent or monopoly of these bare ideas, this little sub-species of story. You are refused, not because there is no invention in the thing—there is mighty little, but there is as much as in nine patents out of ten: where is the author who could not sit on a sofa and speak Patents?—but because the common law, whose creature copyright is, protects in an author, not invention, but constructive labour; gives him no property in bare ideas, but only in a laboured sequence of written words which convey ideas, but are produced by physical and intellectual labour mixed, and are distinctly material in nature and character, though they carry an intellectual force and value.

The piratical imitation of a patented sewing machine is only imitation by skilled workmen of the patentee's ideas; it is not identical reproduction of his wrought-out and embodied ideas, by mere mechanics working a stealing machine. To pirate a patented article you must employ the same kind of constructive skill the patentee, or his paid constructors employ, and then you only mimic; but to pirate an author and steal his identical work, none of an author's skill or labour is required. All the brains required to reproduce mechanically that sequence of words, which is an author's object of property, are furnished to this day by John of Gutenberg, who invented the machine, by which an author lives or dies, as law protects him, or lets thieves rob him with a stealing instrument worked by mere mechanics.

So then the American Legislature protects a foreigner's monopoly, and steals a foreigner's property. The monopoly this great Republic protects is the creature of the British Crown, to which the great Republic owes nothing, and the property it outlaws is a property that arose in the breast and brain and conscience of our common ancestors. They, whose wisdom and justice founded this property in England, were just as much Americans as English, and we all sprang from those brave, just, and honest men.

To swindle poor, weak, deserving, private men of a kindred nation out of this sacred property, which our common ancestors created and venerated and defended against the Crown in "Roper v. Streater," as the United States defended their rights against a Parliament usurping Russian prerogatives, a property which Milton revered, whose heart was with the Pilgrim Fathers, and all just liberty whatever; and to protect a Briton's monopoly, the mere creature of arbitrary prerogative—this double iniquity, I say, is legislation that disgraces the name of legislation and national sentiment; it is a prodigy of injustice, partiality, and inconsistency. What! I spend two thousand hours' labour on a composition; to be sold it must be wedded to vehicles, paper, type, binding, and it must be advertised. I pay the paper-makers, the printers, the binders. I pay the advertisements: the retail trader takes twenty-five per cent. of my gross receipts; the publisher justly shares my profits. The book succeeds. I cross the water with it, and its reputation earned by my labour, and my advertisements; I ask a trifling share of the profits from an American publisher, who profits by me as much as ever my British publisher did. "You!" says he, "you are nobody in this business. I shall pay for the vehicles, but not for the production that sells the vehicles. I shall pay the paper-makers, and also the printers and binders, Britons or not. But I shall take your labour gratis, on the pretence that you are a Briton." The American public pays a dollar for the book; fifty-five cents of the value is contributed by the English author. The various labourers, who are all paid, make up the forty-five cents amongst them. He who alone contributes fifty-five per cent. is the one picked out of half-a-dozen workmen concerned to be swindled out of every cent, and the Legislature never even suspects that by so doing it disgraces legislature and mankind. An Englishman writes a play, mixing labour with invention. The stage carpenter contributes a petty mechanical idea suggested by the scene ; he uses wavy glass at an angle under limelight to represent the water. The play crosses the Atlantic ; anybody steals it for all the Legislature cares, but, if they touch my carpenter's demi-semi-invention, his bare fleshless intellectual idea of placing an old substance, glass, at an angle under another old thing, limelight—"Halte là—ne touchez pas à la Reine !" The creature of Crown Prerogative protects in New York and Boston the naked half idea of the British carpenter. No American glass and limelight honestly bought must be wedded to that bare idea ; and the idea taken gratis. Only the property can be stolen—because it belongs to the everlasting victim of man's beastly cruelty and injustice ; the dirty little British monopoly is secure. The British actor must be paid four times his British price for delivering the British author's property in a New York or Boston theatre ; the fiddlers, Britons or not, for fiddling to it ; the door-keepers for letting in the public to see it, &c. Only the one imperial workman, who created the production, and inspired the carpenter with his lucrative demi-semi-idea, and set the actors acting, and the fiddlers fiddling, and the public paying, and the thief of a manager jingling another man's money, is singled out of about eighty people, all paid out of his one skull, to be swindled of every cent, on the pretence that he is a Briton ; but really because he is an author.

The world—wicked and barbarous as it is—affords no parallel to this. It is not the injustice of earth ; it is the injustice of hell.

CHARLES READE.

TENTH LETTER

SIR,—I ask leave to head this letter

THE FIVE-FOLD INIQUITY.

The outlawry of British authors and their property is a small portion of the injustice. The British Legislature has for years offered the right hand of international justice ; it is therefore the American Legislature that robs the American author in England. That is No. 2. But the worst is behind. The United States are a stiff protectionist nation. The American chair-maker, carriage-maker, horse-breeder, and all producers whatever are secured by heavy imposts against fair competition with foreigners. Also the American publisher, and the American stationer. The tariff taxes paper, I think, and is severe on English books. But turn to the American author.—He cannot write a good work by machinery; like the English author, he can only produce it by labour, intellectual and physical, of a nature proved to shorten life more or less. While he is writing it, debt must accumulate. When written, how is this laborious producer in a protectionist nation protected? Are imported compositions paid for like any other import, and also taxed at the ports to protect the native producer? On the contrary, the foreign literary composition is the one thing not taxed at the ports, and also the one thing stolen. And the State, which dances this double shuffle on the author's despised body at home, robs him of his property abroad.

The enormity escapes the judgment of the American public in a curious way, which I recommend to the notice of metaphysicians. It seems that men can judge things only by measurement with similar things. But the world offers no parallel to this compound iniquity, and so, comparison being impossible, the unique villainy passes for no villainy.

I will try and remove that illusion. Let us suppose a fast-trotting breed of horses, valueless in trade without a car and harness. You must yoke the horse to car and harness, and then they run together, and are valuable; but they don't melt together, because they are heterogeneous properties; and so are the author's composition and its vehicles heterogeneous properties; you may mix the two, but you cannot confound them as you can flour and mustard, by mixing.

An American citizen breeds a horse, at considerable expense, for the dealers. They supply the cart and harness, and have virtually a monopoly in the trade.

Carts and harness, to be imported, must be bought and taxed.

But the Legislature permits the dealer, and trade monopolist to steal foreign horses, and also import them untaxed.

How can the American breeder compete with this double iniquity?

The analogy is strict. This is the social, political, and moral position of the American author, in a protectionist nation, and he owes it to his own Legislature. Our Legislature offers to treat him as a man, not a beast. Now does this poor devil pay the national taxes? He does. What for? The State has no claim on him. The State has outlawed him; has disowned his citizenship, and even his humanity. Is he expected not to take any property he can lay his hand on? Stuff and nonsense! Law is only a mutual compact between man and man. In the American author's case, the Republic, through its representatives, has dissolved that mutual compact, and broken the public faith with the individual subject. The man is now reduced to a state of nature, and may take anything he can lay his hands on. There is not a casuist, alive or dead, who will deny this. Earth offers no parallel to this quintuple iniquity. 1. British monopoly respected. 2. British property stolen. 3. American author struck out of the national system, Protection. 4. Crushed under the competition of foreign stolen goods. 5. Robbed of his natural property, and his rights of man, in England.

A property founded, as the sages of Massachusetts justly say, on the natural rights of man to the fruits of his labour, cannot be property in one country and no property in another. It can be protected in one country and stolen in another; but it is just as much property in the country where it is stolen, as in the country where it is protected. Geographical probity—local morality—Thou shalt not steal—except from a British author out of bounds—Do unto your neighbour as you would he should do to you—unless he is a British author out of bounds—all these are vain endeavours to pass geographical amendments upon God's laws, and on the old common law, and on the great ungeographical conscience of civilised mankind. The honest man spurns these provincial frauds, plain relics of the savage; and the pirate takes them, with a sneer, as stepping-stones to the thing withheld.

In proof of this I give a few indirect consequences of the five-fold iniquity.

1. Mutilation and forgery.—The same people that steal a foreign author's property mutilate it, and forge his name to what he never wrote: and they cannot be hindered, except by international copyright. A.—Tom Taylor and Charles Reade write a comedy called "The King's Rival." Here Nell

Gwynne, a frail woman with a good heart, plays a respectable part, because her faults are not paraded, and her good qualities appear in action. The comedy concludes in the King's closet; he forgives his cousin, the Duke of Richmond, and Frances Stuart; the centre doors are thrown open, the Queen and Court appear, and the King introduces the Duke and Duchess as a newly married couple, and the curtain falls, because the suspense has ceased; and that is a good rule. The character of Nell Gwynne was admirably played, and we arranged for the actress (Mrs. Seymour) to show one hand, and a frolic face at a side curtain, unseen, of course, by the Queen and the Court, who occupy the whole background.

Our Transatlantic thief was not satisfied with this, nor with stealing our brains. He brings Nell Gwynne out of her sly corner into the very centre of the stage, and gives her a dialogue with the King, during which the Queen is mute, perhaps with astonishment. The twaddle of the speakers ends with the King inviting the company to adjourn to the playhouse, and receive another lesson from Mistress Gwynne. That lady, who in the play had shown a great deal less vanity than characterises actresses in general, now replies pedantically for the first time:—

“It is our desire, your Majesty, while we amuse, to improve the mind. Our aim is—

By nature's study to portray most clear
From Beaumont, Fletcher, Jonson, immortal Shakespeare,
How kings and princes by our mimic art
Yield their sway and applaud the actor's part.
The Bard of Avon in that prolific age Traced thoughts upon the enduring page.”

Is it possible?

“Precepts in that powerful work we find
To improve the morals and instruct the mind.
There he holds, as 'twere, a mirror up to Nature,
To-night, king, queen, lords, and ladies act their part,
Each prompted by the workings of the heart,
And Nelly hopes they will not lose their cause—
Nor will they—if favoured—by your applause.”

This is how dunces and thieves improve writers. Though she is the King's mistress, this unblushing hussy stands in the very centre of the stage, with the King between her and his wife, the Queen of England; and though she is an actress who had delivered the lines of Shakespeare, Fletcher, and other melodious poets, she utters verses that halt and waddle, but do not scan. The five-foot line is attempted, but there are four-foot lines and six-foot lines, and lines unscannable. Now there is no surer sign of an uneducated man than not knowing how to scan verses. We detect the uneducated actor in a moment by this. Our self-imposed collaborateur forges the name of a Cambridge scholar and an Oxford scholar to a gross and stupid indelicacy, showing the absence both of sense and right feeling, and also to verses that do not scan. He lowers us, as writers and men, in the United States, which is a very educated country with universities in it; and, as these piratical books are always sent into England, in spite of our teeth, he enables the home pirate to swindle us out of our property, and also out of our credit as artists, scholars, and gentlemen, at home. The humbugs who, following Yates and Camden, say an author should write only for fame, will do well to observe that, wherever our property is outlawed, our reputation and credit as artists are sure to be filched away as well. The Publishers' Circular, a publication singularly gentle and moderate, has had to remonstrate more than once on the double villainy of taking an historical or scientific treatise, using the British author's learning, so far as it suited, and then falsifying his conclusions with a little new matter, and still forging his name to the whole for trade purposes. If this is not villainy, set open the gates of Newgate and Sing-Sing, for no greater rogues than these are in any convict prison.

B.—Fitzball, an English playwright, dramatised a novel of Cooper's. Fitzball coolly reversed the sentiments, and so, without a grain of invention, turned the American inventor's genius inside out, and made him write the Briton up and the colonist down. Such villainy, in time of war, would make a soldier blush. What is it in time of peace? The British Legislature is willing to put this out of any Fitzball's power.

2. Recoil of Piracy.—I have the provincial right in a comedy, "Masks and Faces." Many years ago I let the book run out of print, because I found it facilitated piratical representation. Instantly piratical copies, published in New York, were imported; and, on the most moderate calculation, the American Legislature has enabled British managers, actors, and actresses to swindle me, in my own country, out of eight hundred pounds in the last fourteen years on this single property. I have stopped the piratical version by injunction.

But I can only stop its sale in shops. It penetrates into theatres like a weasel or a skunk; and no protection short of international copyright and stage-right is any protection. America saps British morality by example; British actresses are taught, by Congress, to pillage me in the States. They come over here and continue the habit the American Legislature has taught them. At this very moment I have to sue a Glasgow manager, because an English actress brought over a piratical American book of "Masks and Faces" in spite of the injunction, and they played it in Glasgow; and I can see the lady thinks it hard, since she had a right to pillage her countryman in the States, that she should not be allowed to pillage him also in his own country. That is how all local amendments on the eighth commandment operate. They make the whole eighth commandment seem unreasonable and inconsistent.

3. A Dublin editor pirated my story, "It is Never too Late to Mend," under the title of "Susan Merton: a Tale of the Heart." This alarmed me greatly; it threatened a new vein of fraud on copyrights. I moved the Irish Court of Chancery at once. The offender pleaded ignorance, and produced, to my great surprise, an American paper, in which the story was actually published under the title "Susan Merton: a Tale of the Heart"—and the English author's name suppressed. So careful of an author's fame, my Lord Camden, are those superior spirits who set him an example of nobility by despising his property. "It is Never too Late to Mend" is an ideated title. "Susan Merton" is an unideated title. I never saw an American idiot yet, so I apprehend this ingenious customer altered the title for the worse, and suppressed my name, in order to defraud his own countrymen, by passing the thing off as a novelty in some sequestered nook of the Union. Well, this lie, on the top of the piracy, jeopardized my property in England, and cost me a sum of money; for the defendant could not pay the costs. The piratical proprietor of two Irish newspapers paid £1 per week for a little while, and then disappeared. He went to the States no doubt. I hope he did; for there he'll meet his match.

4. "Foul Play," a drama, was produced in New York. I was on shares with Mr. Boucicault. In course of the representation there was a dispute, the grounds of which, as reported, I could not understand. However, the sheriff came on the stage with his men. There was resistance. Shots were fired, and two humble persons employed in the theatre, an old man and a boy, were wounded. I felt very sorry for these poor fellows, who had no interest in the quarrel. Also I felt half guilty, since it happened in connection with that particular play. I sent out £10 for them, to my friends Messrs. Harper: they were good enough to take charge of the matter and saw the sufferers got it. Now I don't set up for a sweet, benevolent soul; I intended this as a fair percentage to American sufferers, to be paid out of American profits. But the Yankee in charge of the receipts deranged my arithmetic. He levanted with the receipts, and my whole commercial transaction is represented in my books by a payment of that small, but solid percentage upon—air.

The American saw the Britisher recognise our common humanity and not draw geographical distinctions; but he despised my example: for why, he had the example of his Legislature, which says "When you catch a British author here, show your hospitality. Swindle him up hill and down dale—and then go to church and 'pray' to our common Father."

An actress calls on me from Illinois, tall, dark, graceful, handsome, and talks well, as all American ladies do. She wants a new part. Says she has been to another author, and he demanded the price down, because she was an American. Of course I put on a face of wonder at that other author; so inseparable is politeness from insincerity. I let her have "Philippa" and "The Wandering Heir" in the States for ten dollars per night, which is a mere nominal price. Subsequently two English actresses of the very highest merit and popularity asked leave to play the piece in the United States. But the Britisher stood loyal to his Illinois girl. Well, she sent me a very small sum from California. She then went to Australia, played the piece repeatedly; wrote to me eight months ago, telling me she only withheld payments because she was coming to England; and never came to England, nor made me any remittance. The part is invaluable to an actress. It has been played by three actresses in England, and in each case has proved valuable to the performer. In the United States I am done out of it as property, and done out of all returns, because I trusted an American woman in a matter of literary property.

5. My first letter announced that I considered the American author the head victim, and I even suggested how difficult it must be for a novice, even if a man of genius, to get before the public at all. I have now advices from young American authors sending me details. They say that it is very hard to get MSS. read; that, when they bring a picture of American life, it is slighted, and they are advised to imitate some British writer or other; and that, in fact, servile imitation of British styles is a young writer's best chance. But they tell me something I did not divine—that the publishers keep copying machines, and the rejected manuscript often bears the marks of the machine: and the subject-matter is, in due course, piratically used.

Look this cruel thing all round. It becomes the old to feel for the young; let me trace that poor young author's heart. He is young, and the young are sanguine: he is young, and the young are slow to suspect cold-blooded villainy and greed in men that are rich, and need not cheat to live, and live in luxury. He takes his MS. in good faith to a respectable man. He is told that it shall be read. There are delays. The poor young man, or young woman, is hot and cold by turns; but does not like to show too much impatience. However, in time, he begins to fear he is befooled. He calls, and will have an answer one way or other. Then a further short delay is required to re-peruse, or to consider. That delay is really wanted to copy the MS. by a machine. The manuscript is returned with a compliment; but the author is told he is not yet quite ripe for publication: he is paternally advised to study certain models (British) and encouraged to bring another MS. improved by these counsels. Ods Nestor! it reads like criticism, and paternal advice. The novice yields his own judgment; sighs many times if he is a male, if female has a little gentle cry that the swine earth is tenanted by are not asked to pity nor even comprehend; and the confiding American youth, thinking grey hairs and grave advice must be trustworthy, sets to work to discover the practical merit that must lie somewhere or other at the bottom of British mediocrity and "decent debility;" he never suspects that the sole charm of these mediocre models lies not in the British platitudes and rigmarole, but in the Latin word gratis. While thus employed he sees, one fine day, some sketches of life in California, Colorado, or what not, every fact and idea of which has been stolen from his rejected MS., and diverted from its form, and reworded, and printed; while he, the native of a mighty continent, has been sent away, for mundane instruction, to the inhabitants of a peninsula on the north coast of France. The poor novice had contributed a real, though crudish, novelty to literature, as any American can by opening his eyes in earnest, and writing all he sees. It was rejected for reasons that sounded well, but were all trade pretexts stereotyped these many years, though new to each novice in his turn; and now the truth comes out; it was not worth buying cheap; but it was well worth stealing in a nation where the Legislature plays the part of Satan and teaches men the habit of stealing from authors, a habit which, once acquired, is never dropped nor restrained within any fixed limits.

What must be the feelings of the poor young man, or woman, so bubbled, so swindled, and so basely robbed, because he trusted a trader well to do, and did not take him for a ticket-of-leave man turned out of Sing-Sing into a store? And now go behind the swindle, and see how the geographical amendment of the eighth commandment, and the local variation of the golden rule prepare Dives for heaven in spite of parables.

"Rob the British author of his composition, by machinery," says Congress; "We will stop his volumes at our ports: but we will connive at one volume passing, for the use of theft, for theft is all sanctifying; and you have but to take this one volume and wed his stolen composition to bought vehicles, for mind you must only swindle the British author; you must not swindle a Briton unless he is an author, nor an author unless he is a Briton. As for God Almighty, we have a great respect for him—in the proper place, and that is church; but out of church he has not looked into these little matters so closely as we have. He is addicted to general rules; and local distinctions have escaped him. We are more discriminating."

But observe the result. The publisher goes on; "Excelsior" is his motto. Taught to pillage the British author by a miraculously clever machine, the press, he invents another machine and pillages the native author. That machine is also a kind of press, and a clever one; for, like the compositor and the press combined, it separates the author's words from his paper, and steals them with a view to wedding the cream of the composition gratis to other pieces of paper honestly bought, and selling the bought paper and the stolen ideas of the author without regard to his nationality. What does this poor boy gain by being an American at home? He would be safer out of bounds. No British publisher would so abuse his confidence.

Miss Leclercq, an English actress, settled in the United States, purchased not long ago an original play of an American author. She had not played it many nights when it was stolen by means of shorthand writers, and manuscripts sold. When she came to tour the Union with her new American piece honestly paid for, she found it was valueless, being stolen and stale. No legislature can place unnatural limits to fraud, and say to theft, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther, and here shall thy dirty waves be stayed."

You produce a drama in England; it is taken down short-hand for the United States. An Englishman's unpublished play only escapes theft or colourable piracy in the States by failure. Merit is rewarded by pillage.

But I hope enough has been shown to prove that a legislature and its judges launch its people into illimitable fraud, when they pass geographical amendments upon the eighth commandment and the golden rule, and defile the common law with pettifogging distinctions, the fruit of corruption and sophistry, which are bad in law, grossly immoral, revolting to common sense and the conscience of all impartial men, and contradicted by the usage of the old kingdom, and the deeds, and the words, of our common ancestors.

I leave that, and go to public expediency. I shall prove the fivefold iniquity is bad public policy; that the American reading public is between two stools; robbed of free trade in books to swell the taxes, and robbed of a national literature, and a national drama, to gratify one of the smallest cliques in the nation; and this without either the nation or the clique gaining or saving one single cent. So that the thing is suicidal kleptomania. And this I say is one of the bitterest wrongs of authors—that sooner than not pillage them, men will hurt themselves, and will cut their own throats, to wound an author.

CHARLES READE.

ELEVENTH LETTER

THE FOUR FOGS.

SIR.—Outside these letters and Mr. Reverdy Johnson's, international copyright and stage-right are shrouded in four thick fogs—legal, moral, verbal, arithmetical.

I read what is written over the water, and grope for an idea. In vain: it is all verbal and arithmetical fog.

Verbal fog A.—They can't get along without calling copyright and stage-right monopolies; but they dare not risk £50 to £150 upon that fallacy, and it is an irrelevant fallacy here, since international patent-right is a monopoly: and it cannot be used to defend the American Legislature, because that Legislature, for the last hundred years, has declared copyright to be property, in the laws of the separate States and the laws of the Republic, which these ignorant citizens had better begin to read.

B.—But a more delicious piece of verbal fog is this—they say, "We shall not give up free trade in books to please the Britishers." Free trade in books, quotha! why it does not exist in the Union. Free trade is not freebooting. Free trade means buying and selling, unburdened by imposts. Now there is thirty per cent. duty on foreign books at the American ports, and freebooting in copyrights can never supply the place of free trade, for copyright is, in money, only seven per cent. on retail prices; and, as for stage-right, that does not take a cent from the public. The prices of am American theatre are just the same when a play is paid for or stolen. By theft of a foreigner's stage-right the American public has lost a national drama; but it has never gained nor saved the millionth of a cent since the country was colonized.

International stage-right is not offered by those who object to international copyright. These arithmeticians draw no distinction. Against international copyright and stage-right every one of their arguments rests on the notion that the main expense of a book, or of a seat in a theatre, is the dramatist's fee, and the fee which copyright enables a book author to extort directly from the publisher and indirectly from the public purchaser. Of course, so impudent a falsehood is never stated. But why? Statement is not the weapon of a liar, nor of a self-deceiver. Both these personages convey—insinuate—suggest—assume. They never state. Clear statement and detail are antidotes to the subtle poison of vague fallacies. But just test their public arguments, and see if you can find one which does not convey, in a fog of words and figures, that the author's fee is the main expense of a book. One salaried writer not only takes this ground, but, as piracy has deprived Americans of their own judgment, and made them provincial fog-echoes of British muddleheads, he repeats, with true provincial credulity, Macaulay's Fog Epigram, for the instruction of his countrymen. This done, and very old London fog offered to New York for modern sunshine, he infers fairly enough—because the inference is his own—that if domestic copyright is so heavy a tax on the public, a State should hesitate to extend the injustice to foreign nations. Very well, young gentleman: I have no quarrel with you. If Macaulay is right, you are right.

A second-rate rhetorician may be a babe in logic. Macaulay, in this very speech, called copyright "a monopoly in books," and that is verbal fog, as I have shown. The only monopoly in books nowadays is a trade monopoly held by publishers, and established by custom, not law. As for copyright, it is a singularly open property; why every man, woman, and child, in the Republic or the Empire, who can fill a sheet of paper, can create, enjoy, and bequeath a copyright, though a minor, and in case of co-heirs it is distributable like other personal property. It is a property bounded only by nature.

Fog epigrams are for our amusement, not our instruction, and Macaulay's is bottled essence of arithmetical fog.

"Copyright," says he, "is a tax on readers to give a bounty to authors."

Now we will let in a gleam of arithmetical sunshine on this. Writers are human beings with stomachs. They cannot write masterpieces, as Duns Scotus copied the Bible, during the throes of starvation. They must be paid, copyright or no copyright; and an author's copyright has a special operation on a pirate, but none on the reader. Whether an author is paid by wages or by copyright, his remuneration must equally fall on the public purchaser. Macaulay, therefore, has taken a distinction where there is no difference. The Anglo-Saxon muddlehead is always doing this. It is his great intellectual excellence, and makes him the ridicule of Europe.

However, the great vice of his fog epigram is "FRAUDULENT SELECTION." It picks out of many legitimate profits a single one, and conceals the others. If just profits on human labour, &c., were taxes, which they are not, every edition of a work would represent the following taxes:—

1. The rag-picker's profit. 2. The paper merchant and his men. 3. The printer and his men. 4. The binder and his men. 5. The publisher and his staff. 6. The author. 7. The retail bookseller. 8. The advertising column. These are all taxes and bounties, as much as is the author's remuneration, be it wages or copyright. To be sure, if any one of these characters makes an excessive profit, compared with the others, that might be called a bounty. And that reminds me—was not Macaulay's Fog Epigram preceded by another which said, "Publishers drink their wine out of author's skulls"?

Well, if anyone gets a bounty, or excessive profit, it is not the copyrighted author, and I don't think it is the publisher—epigram apart. The public result of these copyright transactions is this:—

The paper merchants are rich.

The printers are rich.

The binders are well to do, but few.

The publishers are well to do. But I deny that they owe that to books.

The authors are the poorest creators of valuable property on the face of the earth.

To descend to details. The retail dealer gets TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. of the retail price. All that authors of books, as a class, extort by means of copyright, is SEVEN PER CENT. on the retail price, which is 10 per cent. on the publisher's net returns. So much for the comparative tax the reader pays to the author and seven more traders. Now for the bounty. This can only be ascertained by measuring the work done against the remuneration. Price of a book to the oppressed reader—say 1 dollar, or 4s. Value of the paper, printing, binding, advertisements, 45c., or thereabouts; of the composition, 55c. Sole creator of the composition, the author; his remuneration 7 per cent., his share of the production worth 55 per cent. Droll bounty this!! For passing the book through his hands, often on sale or return, the retailer gets 25 per cent. What the other traders and workmen get, I cannot say, nor is it necessary. Enough that they are all richer than the authors.

Now compare the arithmetical fog of Macaulay, and his transatlantic echo, with this gleam of arithmetical sunshine.

The American Legislature now knows the worst. Seven per cent. on the retail price does domestic copyright enable authors, one with another, to screw out of a book. Seven per cent. is all we expect, or hope, or ask, from the great Republic, and all the American author will ever get in England.

The misfortune of authors is this—they cannot, as a class, secure any remuneration at all except through copyright. But copyright effects this just end by unpopular means. It stops all sale till it secures a modest remuneration. Then men, forgetting that the stoppage of sale is not the end, but only that severe means to a just end, which the heartless dishonesty of mankind makes necessary, fall into needless fear of the tyrannical means that leads to a mild result. This sentiment it is which leads to a misgiving in the United States that international copyright would be abused to enhance the prices of English books. Americans do not really know our book trade, and are led to natural but erroneous notions of English prices by seeing the three-volume novel advertised at 31s. 6d. But the truth is we have a rotten trade for the upper ten thousand, and a healthy trade for the nation. The rotten trade is the hiring trade; of course, it operates on books just as it does on pianofortes—it reduces the customers to a handful, and artificial prices become a necessity of that one narrow market. The 31s. 6d. is all humbug, the public does not buy a copy, the sale is confined to the libraries, and the real price is 15s. to 18s., if by a popular author, but otherwise 9s. to 12s. But it is a calamitous system, encourages the writing of rubbish, and enables the librarian, whose customers are a class born to be humbugged, to hold back the good book, and substitute the trash, with dishonest excuses, in the credulous country customer's parcel. But so far from clinging to this rotten trade, intelligent authors and publishers in this country would gladly see it done away with, and the universal habit of buying books restored: and I, for one, look to the American publishers to help us in this with their sounder system; for under just laws, when a sound system encounters an unsound, it is always the unsound that gives way. Below the above rotten trade lies the true trade of the country,—good books at moderate prices,—and some books and periodicals at wonderfully small prices. These very novels, sold to the libraries at fabulous prices, are sold to the public in one volume at 6s., 5s., and 2s. At 2s. they are in boards, with an illustration outside, and a vignette.

To show what a bugbear copyright is in books of durable sale, American publishers can't produce such a volume for 50c., by stealing the composition, as the English publishers do, paying copyright.

I submit to you specimens of cheap publications under copyright, and I challenge the American publishers to match them with cheap piratical books or papers.

However, there is nothing new under the sun. The fear that British authors or the assignees of their American copyrights might stand out for our library prices in the United States is an old misgiving which has had its day in England. Queen Anne's Parliament had much such a fear. Well! What did they do? Why, provided against it in a section giving a right of complaint to several great functionaries, or any one of them, and investing those dignitaries with special powers to compel the publication on reasonable terms. The precaution proved quite superfluous; for not one single human being was so perverse as to lock up a good book, or sell it at a price the public could not afford. The section was a dead letter, and is now repealed. However, if the Legislature of the United States is uneasy on this head, it is not for us, who ask a great boon, to make childish difficulties. Here is the cure in a stroke of the pen:—

"And that the price of books written by British subjects, but papered, printed, and bound in the United States, as hereinbefore enacted, may not be unduly enhanced, be it enacted that the proprietor of the copyright in any such work shall be compelled to publish, or cause the same to be published, in the United States, within the times hereinbefore specified, at a reasonable price, not exceeding the highest price that is demanded for a book of the same character, size, and quality, written by an American citizen, and published at, or about, the time; and the price of such work shall be duly notified and advertised in three journals of large circulation seven days before publication, and, should the price so advertised appear excessive, it shall be lawful for any person to lodge a complaint with [here enumerate the functionaries], and the on the said complainant giving security for costs and offering evidence, shall have authority to suspend the publication and hear the evidence without delay, and, if the price advertised be excessive, shall affix a just and reasonable price, provided always that in those cases where the book shall be published for the foreign proprietor by an agent being a native of the United States, the agent, or proprietor, shall be allowed to add the reasonable fee of the agent to the price of the said book." Add a clause giving various and large discretionary powers to the said judges.

If, with all these safeguards to the American public, to the stationers, and the public, international stage-right, against which no objection has ever been offered, and international copyright, both properties that belong to us by common law, are both refused to the American and British author, while international patent-right is enacted, and yields a balance of £300,000 a year, British money, to American citizens, then justice is nothing, fair play is nothing, humanity to those men living, whom the Republic worships dead, is nothing, and a national literature is nothing, and it is nothing for a great nation which in the heat and misery of its war, could find pity and substantial generosity for one set of British subjects, and by so doing has covered itself with glory—it is nothing, I say, for that noble nation to single out another set of British subjects less improvident, and more deserving, and make war upon those worthy, weak, and unarmed men in time of peace.

Could I gain the ear of one Ulysses Grant, I think he would side with the weak; and if he did the quintuple iniquity would soon fall; for it is not so well defended as Richmond was.

TWELFTH LETTER.

SIR,—Permit me to head this short letter

THE IMPENITENT THIEF.

This is a character disapproved in Jewish history. But he has it all his own way with us in Anglo-Saxony. One of his traits is to insult those whom he pillages. He puts one hand in our pockets, and shakes the other fist in our faces. As an example I note some sneers by a Mr. Pascoe, and other professors of moral and arithmetical fog, that authors, in asking for international copyright, show an excessive love of money.

That remark applies more to those, who covet the property of others, than to those who only covet their own. It is a sneer that comes as ill from salaried writers, who cannot be pillaged, as it does from pensioned lawyers; and it is a heartless sneer; for they know by history—if they know anything—that authors have passed through centuries of pauperism, misery, and degradation, and have only arrived at modest competence and decent poverty. Popular authors are rare, and even their income does not approach that of the prosperous lawyer, divine, physician, actor, or actress. There are two actors about, who have each made one hundred and fifty thousand pounds by playing a single part in two plays, for which the two authors have not received two thousand pounds. The painter has two great markets, his picture and his copyright. The author has but one. International copyright will merely give him two, and raise him to the painter's commercial level. No author has ever left a fortune made by writing. Dickens, the sole apparent exception, was a reader and a publisher. As a rule, when a respectable author dies, either he had independent means, or the hat goes round. If authors are to be respected in Anglo-Saxony, they must not be poor; they must have better terms at home, or international copyright, to meet the tremendous advance of price in the necessaries of life. Three or four stray individuals, such as Milton and Spinoza, have been poor and dignified. But they were raræ aves. Dignified poverty in a class is a chimera. It never existed. The character of a class is the character of the majority in that class; now no majority has ever resisted a strong temptation, and that is why all greatly tempted classes fall as classes. Johnson knew more than Camden, and he says, "Poverty is the worst of all temptations; it is incessant, and leads, soon or late, to loss of self-respect, and of the world's respect." The hypocrite Camden demanded an author with aspiring genius and no eye to the main chance. The model he demanded crossed his path in Oliver Goldsmith; but the hypocrite Camden treated his beau-idéal with cold hauteur, because his beau-idéal was poor; the same hypocrite was to be seen arm-in-arm with Garrick, for he had lots of money.

Oliver Goldsmith, next to Voltaire, was the greatest genius in Europe; on the news of his death Burke burst into tears, and Reynolds laid down his brush and devoted the day to tender regrets,

I now cite a passage verbatim from the notice on Goldsmith in the "Biographia Dramatica:"—"It was at first intended to bury him in Westminster Abbey; and his pall was to have been supported by the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Louth, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Burke, and Mr. Garrick. But a slight inspection of his affairs showed the impropriety of incurring so great an expense. He was privately interred in the Temple burial-ground, attended by Mr. Hugh Kelly, Mr. Hawes, the Rev. Joseph Palmer, and a few coffee-house acquaintances."

If the deceased genius was poor, Reynolds, and Garrick, and the rest, were rich. They could have secured him the place he deserved in the national temple. But no: he was poor: and observe, those who were ready to lay genius in Westminster Abbey had it been wealthy, would not even follow it to the Temple Church, when they found it was poor. The fact is, that great immortal genius was flung into the earth like a dog, and to this day nobody knows where he lies.

I now cite verbatim from the "Life of Mrs. Oldfield:"—"The corpse of Mrs. Anne Oldfield was carried from her house in Grosvenor Street to the Jerusalem Chamber, where it lay in state, and afterwards to the Abbey, the pall being supported by the Lord Delawar, Lord Harvey, the Right Honourable Bubb Doddington, and other men of ton."

This lady was a good actress, and had lived in open shame with Mr. Maynwaring and Brigadier Churchill, and had lots of money. Therefore this artist was buried in the Abbey, and the greater artist, Goldsmith, being pure, but poor, had the grave of a dog.

In these two extracts you see the world unmasked by its own hand, not mine. This, my Lord Camden, is that dirty world, of which you were a gilt lump. This is the real world as it is, and was, and always will be. Many authors are womanish; so they listen to the flatteries that cost nothing, and, when they find it is all humbug, they sit down and whine for a world less hollow and less hard. But authors, who are men, take the world as they find it, see its good sense at the bottom of its brutality, and grind their teeth, and swear that the public weasel shall not swindle them into that unjust poverty, which the public hog despises in an author, and would in an apostle.

CHARLES READE.

THIRTEENTH LETTER.

SIR,—An egotist has been defined a man who will burn his neighbour's house down to cook himself two eggs.

If it be true that three or four American publishers are the sole obstacle to international stage-right and copyright, the definition applies, so great is the injury they do ; so little, if any, the advantage to themselves. How would international stage-right injure them? Yet it is they who crush it, and demoralise theatrical business, and kill the national drama. How would even international copyright, on the conditions I have offered, injure them? It could not hurt them at present ; it must improve their condition in the end. The professors of arithmetical fog call it “a present to British authors.” The idiots ! is it any more a boon to English than to American authors? It is a present to neither. On the contrary, it offers the publisher his highest remuneration for his smallest outlay. Take a popular English novel—it is not unusual to sell 120,000 copies at a dollar. Under piracy by law established, one publisher does not get the sale. Often the thing is torn to pieces ; but let us limit the publication to four persons ; assuming that each sells about 30,000 copies at a profit of 25 cents, that gives 7,500 dols. I admit that under international copyright 7 per cent. must be deducted for the British right. But then the publisher who pays the Briton, will sell all the books. Now 120,000 copies at a profit of 25 cents minus 7 = 18 gives a total of 21,600 dollars. And here you may see the reason why copyrighted books can be sold cheaper than pirated books, yet yield a good profit.

Publication of books is in a general way a poor business. Men of enterprise and talent would not descend to it but for the great prizes. I therefore reason fairly in taking a book of large sale for trade sample ; not that 120,000 copies is a very large sale in the United States ; I know books that have quadrupled that figure in a year's sale.

Under international copyright the American publisher, dealing either by purchase or otherwise with British copyright, could also levy a just and moderate tariff on the 400 or 500 newspapers that now steal any popular British book. So much for the American side. But the American publisher would also, by his position and intelligence, secure many of the American copyrights in England, and, even if he contented himself with an author's percentage there, that would be at least a set-off, though it needs no set-off. But if, on the contrary, he should take the public advice I have given him, and have a place of business in London—which is the great game—all manner of lucrative combinations would arise under international copyright. That great boon would not change the nature of authors and make them, as a class, hard bargainers or even good men of business. They deserve 7 per cent. in each market, but they would not be sharp enough to get it one time in thirty.

When you add to all this that international copyright would relieve the American author of the competition of stolen goods, which is stifling him, and make the most intellectual country in the world a hotbed of intellectual productions, by which the American publishers must necessarily profit most, their opposition to international justice and public policy will, I hope, cease; for it would be egotism beyond the definition supra; it would be the blind egotism, that sacrifices national honour and the clear interests of all producers, and of the public reader, to one sham interest.

With this letter I send one to a powerful American firm, offering them again what I offered them years ago, that, under international copyright, they shall be my London publishers, if they please, and publish my books, if they please, on the very terms I will demand of them in New York: 7 per cent. on the retail price, which is 10 per cent. on the trade sale price. As I am popular in America, and perhaps no writer under international copyright could make better bargains, and as I pass for a screw, this should tend to convince reasonable Americans that international copyright, though a great boon to authors and honest publishers on both sides the water, is not a tax upon any one. Consider—for passing my books through their hands in London I offer an American firm all I will ask in New York for having written those books; for having written those books I will ask no more in the United States than I offer them for just passing the books through their hands in London. Please bring your minds to bear on this, you that possess a mind.

So much for petty expediency and financial fog. Ought these to stand in the way of national justice, national impartiality, and a national literature? Ought classes so important as the American author, the American spectator of plays, and the American reader, to be mocked with the title of Republicans, yet misgoverned and outlawed by a Venetian oligarchy, a mere handful of short-sighted traders, clinging blindly to piracy as some men cling to drink, not that it does them an atom of good, but just because they have got into the habit?

Those mediævals whose lofty method—conjecture v. evidence—Sir Joseph Yates follows in copyright, discovered that witches who rode upon the whirlwind and led the storm could be arrested in their furious career by two straws placed across. When I consider with what pitiable reasons the five-fold iniquity has been defended, and is even now defended, against Mr. Reverdy Johnson, and these letters, I seem to see the men of the dark ages laying down their straws. Ah! and so you think national justice, honour, and humanity are three old beldams that will never pass your straws? I deem more nobly than you do of the nation you disgrace and mislead. The people that were in trouble yet relieved the British cotton-spinners must have a heart not bounded by the ocean; the nation that could, at a cost of blood and treasure, forego the two-legged beast of burden and make the negro a man, must have a conscience; and our turn will come, please God, though my head and heart may both have ceased to ache at man's bad logic, and man's injustice. Yes, the great Republic has raised its negro to the level of a man; it will one day admit its authors to the level of a negro.

Farewell, you four fogs, farewell you rogues and fools who made them; I leave the pettifogger who reasons à priori against evidence, and divines that the common law abhors forfeiture of a right—unless it is held by an author—and reads implied contracts as “exchange of equivalents”—unless one of the parties is an author, and if an author gives a written copy without reserve, and abandons, for eighty years, his right to publish, says that is no gift of the right to publish; but if, instead of laches and neglect and all that really forfeits a right, he adds possession to title and sells one copy to a man, says that sale is a gift of the right of publication. I leave the liars, idiots, and beasts, who reason thus against evidence, and call it law, with one remark: the greatest asses God has ever made are little lawyers. Your little lawyer is a man, who has parted with the good sense of the layman, and has not advanced one inch towards the science of a Mansfield or a Story.

I leave the men of verbal fog, the poor addlepaters, who call a man's sole right to sell his own composition "monopoly," and his sole right to sell his own hen and her chickens, his own seed and its great increase, "property;" and call free-booting in copyright with a 30 per cent. tax on books "free trade in books."

I leave the ranting rogues, the romantic pickpockets, who say that an author is to work only for praise (against which dispraise and foul scurrility are not to weigh, of course), but that a judge and an archbishop are to work for money as well as credit—in a word, I leave the whole tribe of gorillas and chimpanzees, in whose hands I found this subject, to recommence their incurable gibbering and chattering; reason they never did, and never will. As for me, I shall take leave to rise, for a little while, above their dunghill in a fog, and speak as a man who by long study of the past has learned to divine the future, and is fit to advise nations.

1. Justice to authors is the durable policy of nations.

2. The habit of inventing is a richer national treasure than a pyramid of stolen inventions.

3. Invention is on the average the highest and hardest form of mental labour. It is the offspring of necessity, and nursed by toil.

4. Hence it follows that in whatever country invention can be appropriated by direct theft, or adaptation, or any easy process except purchase, the habit of invention is discouraged, and each act of invention undersold and the inventor punished.

5. Therefore, by pirating from foreign authors, a nation scratches the foreign author's finger, but cuts the native author's throat, and turns its own intellectual sun into a moon, and robs itself of the habit of inventing, which is a richer national treasure than a pyramid of stolen inventions. This is a universal truth: the experience of Europe in every age confirms it, and in the United States it is a special truth, for the Republic has put justice and injustice side by side, so that even a child may see which is the more enduring policy. Of international patent right the result has been rapid and remarkable. The States were behind us in invention; they soon advanced upon us, and caught us, and now they head us far. International justice began with a trade balance in our favour; yet now the States draw an enormous balance from Europe, and about three hundred thousand a year from Great Britain. Europe teems with the material products of American genius

American patents print English newspapers and sew Englishmen's shirts; a Briton goes to his work by American clocks, and is warmed by American stoves and cleansed by American dust collectors; whereas my housemaid, when she dusts with a British broom, only drives it from pillar to post. In a word, America is the leading nation in all matters of material invention and construction, and no other nation rivals nor approaches her. It is "Eclipse first, and the rest nowhere."

Now do but turn an eye to the opposite experiment. What is the position in the world of the American author? Does he keep pace with the American patentee? Why, it is a complete contrast; one is up, the other is down; one leads old nations, the other follows them: one is a sun diffusing his own light over his hemisphere and ours, the other a pale moon lighted by Europe. Yet the American mechanical inventor has only the forces and materials our mechanical inventor can command; whereas the American author has larger, more varied, and richer materials than ours. Even in fiction, what new material has the English artist compared with that gold mine of nature, incident, passion, and character—life in the vast American Republic? Here you may run on one rail from the highest civilisation to the lowest, and inspect the intervening phases, and write the scale of man. You may gather in a month amidst the noblest scenes of nature the history of the human mind, and note its progress. Here are red man, black man, and white man. With us man is all of a colour, and nearly all of a piece; there contrasts more piquant than we ever see spring thick as weeds; larger and more natural topics ring through the land, discussed with broader and freer eloquence. In the very Senate, the passions of well-dressed men break the bounds of convention; and nature and genuine character speak out in places, where with us etiquette has subdued them to a whisper. Land of fiery passions, and humours infinite, you offer such a garden of fruits as Molière never sunned himself in, nor Shakspeare neither. And what food for poetry and romance were the feats of antiquity, compared with the exploits of this people? Fifty thousand Greeks besieged a Phrygian city, fighting for a rotten leaf; the person of an adulteress without her mind. This ten years' waste of time is a fit subject for satire; only genius has perverted it into an epic; what cannot genius do? But what is it in itself, and what were the puny wars of Pompey and Cæsar, compared with a civil war, where not a few thousand soldiers met on either side to set one Pompey up, one Cæsar down; but armies like those of Xerxes encountered again and again, fighting not for the possession of a wanton, nor the pride of a general, but the integrity of a nation and the rights of man. Yet the little old things sound great and the great new things sound small, caerent quia vate sacro.

The other day man's greatest feat of labour was the Chinese wall. It is distanced. An iron road binds hemispheres together. See it carried over hill and dale, through civilized and uncivilized countries; see the buffaloes glare and snort; and the wild tribes gallop to and fro in rage and terror, as civilization marches with sounding tread, from sea to sea. See iron labour pierce the bowels of the mountain, and span the lake's broad bosom. It creeps; it marches; it climbs; it soars; it never halts; the savages arm, and saddle their wild steeds; they charge; they fire; they wheel about, with flaming eyes and flying arrows; but civilization just takes its rifle in one hand and its pick in the other, and the labours of war and peace go on together, and still the mighty iron road creeps, climbs, and marches from hemisphere to hemisphere, and sea to sea.

These are the world-wide feats that touch mankind, and ought to thrill mankind. Yet they go for less than small old things done in holes and corners—caerent quia vate sacro. For there, where the soil is so fertile, art is sterile. Few are the pens that glow with sacred fire; few great narrators; and not one great dramatist. Read the American papers—you revel in a world of new truths, new fancies, and glorious crude romance, awaiting but the hand of art; you roll in gold-dust. Read their dramas or narratives—How French! How British! How faint beside the swelling themes life teems with in this nation, that is thinking, working, speaking, living, and doing everything except writing, at a rate of march without a present rival or a past parallel beneath the sun.

The reason is nine-tenths of their heaven-born writers are nipped in the bud, snubbed, starved, and driven out of immortal literature by piracy before they can learn so profound and difficult an art. Some driven into business; some driven on to the land, which there God, in his mercy, has thrown open to the oppressed; some driven into journals that go bankrupt by the hundred.

Mr. Emerson: "There are men in this country who can put their thoughts in brass, in iron, stone, or wood ; who can build the best ships for freight, and the swiftest for ocean race. Another makes revolvers, another a power press. But scarcely one of our authors has thrown off British swaddling clothes. The great secret of the world-wide success of ' Uncle Tom ' was its novelty ; it had something peculiarly American in it. The works of American authors have been smothered under English authors in the American market. Not only has the wholesale system of mal-appropriation most injuriously affected the interests of living American authors, but it has a tendency to dwarf down the original literature of the United States to a servile copyism, and to check the development of the national mind."

Piracy is a upas tree. If you really love your great Republic, and wish to see it honoured and appreciated, down with that upas tree, and you will lead the world in art as well as in mechanics. The gorillas and chimpanzees are not ashamed to say that they see no consequences of international justice, but that books will be dearer in the States. Perhaps not, and for that very reason we don't look to gorillas for prescience, or to chimpanzees for prophecy.

Of international copyright and stage-right the following are a few, and only a few, of the certain consequences :—

1. The American publishers will say, "Confound John Bull. We'll show him we can do without him." They will read American MS. with a kindlier eye. Young American authors will get a chance to learn their art by practice.

2. American publishers will have a place of business in London. Combinations will arise they never dreamt of. They will do all sorts of business with our authors and publishers, and often take the whole property in Britain, her colonies, and the States.

3. Australia, seeing so good an example, will fall into better practical arrangements both with Great Britain and the States. Waste a few years more and she will pillage us both.

4. The deep and sullen resentment British authors now feel against the American nation will give way to kindly and grateful feelings. They will go over to the States, not to fleece the natives in return, by reading poor lectures in a country of good lectures, nor yet to skim a few States with jaundiced eye and publish shallow venom ; but to sojourn and study, with keen and kindly eye, the nation, best worth studying in the universal globe. From this will arise great pictures of American life with some inaccuracies.

5. Taught by foreigners their own treasures, Americans will begin to take bird's-eye views of American life, and we shall get great American narratives of all sorts, and, by-and-by, a great play or two.

6. The American women, better cultivated than other women, reared with larger minds, and less overburdened with domestic cares, will begin to take their true place in Anglo-Saxon literature. A brilliant career awaits them.

7. Americans are mortified, and justly, at the sullen apathy of Europe and British indifference. It will soon cease when the cause ceases. They have made a bad selection; the Britons they should have outlawed are the chimney-sweeps, not the intellectual lords who guide public opinion. All they do will be noticed and criticised justly, and no nation is the worse for that.

8. International property is a bond of friendship and a security for peace and good-will. There will be in each country several persons holding property in the other, and desirous to compose differences, not inflame them; whereas the writer for wages is comparatively reckless, and has often jeopardised peace with his stings.

9. Eventually the States will produce beyond men's wildest dreams at present. Nature is rich; we are too apt to bound her by the narrow experience of our own life. Time, population, and encouragement will grow another Scott, another Cooper, another Byron, and even perhaps another Shakspeare; for, under equal rights, intellectual giants are far more likely to spring in the States than here. The studies of Bret Harte, the pastorals of Carleton, and other true gleams of genius that now come from the States are like jets of water forcing their way through a sea-wall. The gorillas and chimpanzees look at them, and say "that is all the water there is." To a higher intelligence they show how strong is nature, that any water at all can come through the barrier of bad laws. Remove the wall, and the infinite waters will flow, where now those struggling jets reveal the curbed ocean.

The true law-giver is rare. For ages senators have preferred party to mankind, and it has made them as ephemeral as gad-flies. Your Solon and Lycurgus climbed hills above the dust of strife and the mists of clique, and took a bird's-eye view of all the land. If, amongst my American readers there is one senator, to whom the old Republican law-giver seems a bigger, and a better, and a more enduring man, than the ephemeral mouth-piece of ephemeral party, he can play the ancient law-giver on a grander field than antiquity affords. It is not every day that a single earnest statesman can brighten the tarnished escutcheon of a great and generous Republic, and heal the deep wound of a kindred nation, cut down a five-fold iniquity and a national upas tree, lay the first stone of a mighty literature, and earn the gratitude of the greatest minds in two great countries. This would be to rise above the mob of senators, the noisy squabblers of a Congress, and them "whose talk is of bullocks." If there be such a man at Washington—and surely there must be many—let him hold out his hand and grasp true honour, not vociferous, but lasting; the arts, immortal themselves, confer immortal fame, or infamy, on friend and foe; cliques and parties come and go; but these flow on for ever; and, though no greasy palms applaud their champion, to the bray of trumpets, and the flare of gas, a mild but lasting light, still brightening as justice spreads and civilisation marches, shall hover around his living head, and gild his memory when dead. The words of Reade are ended.

Sir,—I did intend to go into the domestic wrongs of authors. But, as a commission of inquiry is about to collect facts, it would be more proper, on many accounts, to postpone that matter. Besides I have already intruded too long. Be pleased to accept our thanks for the sacrifice you have made to justice; you have allowed a worthy but unpopular subject to occupy many, many columns of a popular journal, and both American and English authors owe you a deep debt of gratitude, which, unfortunately, we can only pay in words.

CHARLES READE.

LETTER TO MR. J. R. LOWELL
ON INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

19, ALBERT GATE, KNIGHTSBRIDGE,
September 2, 1880.

DEAR MR. LOWELL,

You are good enough to desire my opinion upon a proposed Copyright Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, "the principal feature of which is the granting of Copyright, provided the book be manufactured in the country so granting it by a subject or citizen thereof within three months of its publication by the author."

To reply to this outline I must ask to dissect it; for here in one sentence are two proposals that I consider heterogeneous, and even discordant.

Permit me then to put the matter thus:—

1.—The book to be manufactured in the country granting Copyright, by a subject or citizen.

2.—This to be done (and I conclude the book published) within three months, &c.

No. 1.—Let us examine precisely the grievance this treaty proposes to alleviate.

An author's work which, when worth pirating, is the fruit of great labour, consists of an essential substance and a vehicle.

The substance is the composition; the vehicle is generally paper and words written with ink.

That the composition is the substance—though puny lawyers and petty tatesmen cannot see it, is shown by this—it can be sold vivâ voce apart from paper and written or printed words : dramatic compositions are so sold, and the first Epic poem was so delivered to the public for centuries, and the Chronicles of Froissart were sold vivâ voce by the author, and to his great profit, and no copies made till he died ; and the public used to pay Dickens a much higher price for his spoken compositions, than for the same compositions papered, printed, and bound.

A printed book, or play, is only the manuscript multiplied ; the composition remains the substance ; the paper, print, and binding, are still a mere vehicle, and not the only one ; the Theatre sells the same composition with quite a different vehicle.

Now the grievance of authors against nations cultivating piracy is this—they rob the foreign workman, who produces the substance, of a book or play, yet remunerate all the workmen, whether native or foreign, who produce the mere vehicle. The injury is levelled at the foreign author quâ author, and not quâ foreigner.

Let a foreign author cross the water with a play and a book. Let him go into a theatre and a printing-house ; let him play one of those many characters he has created in his drama, and print fifty pages of his own composition, he can extort remuneration—although he is a foreigner—for both vehicles ; but he can enforce none for the far more valuable substance he has created with infinitely greater, higher, and longer labour. Here then is an exceptional fraud levelled at exceptional merit, and one producing labourer picked out of a dozen for pillage, though what he produces contributes more to the aggregate value, than the labour of all the other workmen concerned.

This iniquity may pay a handful of booksellers, or theatrical managers, in a nation cultivating Piracy, but it massacres the authors of that nation by the competition of stolen compositions, and it robs the nation of the habit of literary and dramatic invention, which is a greater national treasure than any amount of stolen compositions, since the nation, which harbours pirates, has to pay the full price for the vehicles, and does not get the substance or composition for nothing, any the more because its booksellers and theatrical managers do. Indeed, as to the latter, the prices are never lowered to the native public one cent, in those cases where the manager steals the drama from a foreign author.

Now proposition 1, taken singly, entirely cures the above grievance, so far as printed books are concerned.

Authors have a moral right to be paid for their composition, in every nation where the vehicle is paid for and the combination sold, not given away; but they have no moral claim, that I am aware of, to create and sell the vehicle in a distant land, and if they have no such right, still less can their native publishers—mere occasional assignees of copyright—pretend to acquire a right from authors, which authors themselves do not claim.

The United States are a protectionist nation, and it would be egotistical and childish of English authors to expect that nation to depart from its universal policy, and to make an exception in favour of authors, and their mere occasional assignees; our cry is “no partiality!” To ask you to deviate from your universal policy would be to ask for “some partiality.”

Proposition 2.—This rests on no basis of universal equity or of uniform national policy. It does not come from the mind of any American lawyer or statesman. It is one of those subtle suggestions of Piracy, with which all copyright acts are marred. Copyrights are neither meal nor meat, and therefore, like other products of high civilization, they cannot obtain their just value on a forced sale. But three months to transact the sale of the composition and also create the vehicle is a very forced sale.

Habits are strong, and this proviso would encourage the bad habit the treaty professes to cure, instead of stimulating a good one. It would turn all the publishers, on both sides the water, into Lot's wives, hankering after dear old Piracy, and longing to put the clock on three months. By hanging back during that short period they might drive even popular authors into a corner. But the proviso would do a much worse thing than that—the rising American author, who is literally withering under the present system, and who is the victim, that needs loyal and earnest protection, far more than any British author does—would be juggled, under this proviso. For some years he must necessarily come into our market at a certain disadvantage independent of law. British publishers would either offer him one-tenth of his value or demand time to see how his book sold in the United States: and then, having gained time, would use this proviso, steal his composition, if it proved a success, or chuck him a bone instead of his just slice.

But these comments, you will understand, are levelled at the nude proviso as you have presented it to me.

If your government has foreseen that it is certain to be abused, and to render the whole treaty more or less illusory, and therefore intends to control it by some other clause, that is another matter.

If not, and the proviso has been incautiously inserted with the reasonable desire to protect the public against a foreign author's refusal to sell his copyright at all, or on reasonable terms, the whole case could be met by an additional clause giving the foreign author or proprietor the right to apply to the Judges in Banco for an extension of the term, on the ground that he had offered the copyright, or a share in it, or the use of it, but had been unable to obtain terms corresponding in any degree with his market value at home. The judges to have the right to receive written evidence, less strict than a jury would require, and to extend the term or authorize the foreign proprietor to publish through a native agent, or afford some other relief, under the vital conditions of the treaty.

Having gone deeper into the matter than I intended, I may as well volunteer a remark or two outside your queries, which may be of service to the American Legislator, if he will receive it from me.

There are two great literary properties of nearly equal value and importance.

1. A man's exclusive right to print and publish the composition he has created, whether history, romance, treatise, or drama, etc.

2. His exclusive right to represent on a public stage the dramatic composition he has created.

No. 1 is called Copyright, No. 2 is called Stage-right. But, unfortunately, the Anglo-Saxon muddlehead has hitherto avoided the accurate term, stage-right, and applied, in the teeth of sense, grammar, and logic, the imbecile phrase, "dramatic copyright," to No. 2. But the phrase, "dramatic copyright," means the sole right of printing and publishing a play-book, or it means nothing at all. It cannot mean, nor be made to mean the right of representing a play. Now men are the slaves of words; and so our lawgivers and yours, having the word "copy-right" dinned eternally into their ears, and never hearing the word "stage-right," are at this moment in a fool's paradise. They imagine copyright to be an all important right and stage-right an insignificant affair.

Pure chimera! stage-right is at least as important as copy-right, and international morality and sound policy demand international stage-right as much as they do international copyright.

Our two nations invest their money on the following scale.

1. A vast sum daily in newspapers, of which the title is copyright; but not the contents. These protect themselves from fatal piracy; they die a natural death every afternoon, and so escape assassination next morning.

2. A small sum, daily, in books.

3. A large sum, daily, in represented plays—one hundred thousand pounds sterling per day at the very least.

As regards 2 and 3, you will find the comparative scale indicated in the newspapers themselves; these, with unerring instinct, discover the habits of their nation. Take them through the breadth of the land, you will find they review a book now and then, but they are eternally puffing plays, and at great length.

Now by piracy of stage-right from foreigners, a nation loses its chance of that great treasure, a national drama, and does not get one cent per annum in exchange for that serious deprivation. The piratical publisher pretends he sells a book cheaper for stealing the composition. It is not true; for, if he bought the composition under a copyright act, he would sell all the copies instead of sharing the sale with other pirates; and so could sell cheaper than in the way of Piracy: but, if not true, it is plausible, and has deceived shallow statesmen by the score.

But the piratical manager of a theatre does not even pretend to lower his prices to the public in those cases, when he steals the composition.

There are, besides all this, two special reasons why you should propose international stage-right to the British Government, along with international copyright, and not as an after-clap, which you will have to do if you will not listen to Cassandra, better known in Knightsbridge as Charles Reade. One is, that the people most likely to give you trouble in this country, over international copyright, are the British publishers. Habitual creators of the vehicle and not of the composition and the copyright, they will naturally think it very hard they are not to be allowed to create the vehicle in the United States.

Their opposition might be serious; because, for some generations, they have been allowed to thrust themselves forward and put the authors unreasonably in the background.

To discuss with our Government the two great properties authors create, viz.: stage-right and copyright, would tend to open John Bull's eyes and show him which is really the leading character in literary property, the authors, who create all the stage-rights and all the copyrights, or the publishers, who acquire by assignment about one-third of the copyrights only, and none of the stage-rights.

The second reason is that at present the American dramatic author suffers a special iniquity, by Act of Parliament, deteriorating the common law of England.

If a British author writes a drama, represents it on the stage in Great Britain, but does not publish it, and then exports it to the United States, he possesses the sole right of representation in the United States, or, at all events, in the principal States. This has been decided by your judges after full and repeated discussion.

The American dramatist, until 1842, possessed the same right under the law of England; and accordingly Macklin v. Richardson, which is the English case that protects all unpublished dramas under the common law, was lately cited with authority in the tribunals of the United States on the occasion I have referred to.

But our copyright act of 1842 poked its nose into stage-right, with which it had nothing on earth to do, and inserted an unjust, oppressive, and unreasonable clause, outlawing from stage-right all dramas not first represented in Great Britain. The framers of this, and a similar clause in the body of the act, mistook the root of an author's title. The poor souls imagined it accrues by publication or representation under an Act of Parliament, whereas it accrues earlier in time, and by an older and much higher title, viz.: creation, and under the common law.

Test.—Let A. write a MS. and lend it to B. B. print and publish it, and register it at Stationers' Hall, and hand the MS. back, uninjured, without a scratch on it, to A. A. would sue B. for breach of copyright, under the common law, and B.'s parliamentary title, by publication and registration, would prove not worth a rush against the precedent title by creation and common law.

The American dramatist, therefore, is by the above clause in an act that had no need to run, like a frolicsome colt, out of copyright into stage-right, and so extend the field of its blunders, subjected to a special iniquity.

In copyright there is, at present, a sort of equity of fraud. Rob my authors, and I will rob your authors. But in stage-right it is pure iniquity, and the American dramatist the victim.

These are the principal reasons why I venture to advise you not to exclude international stage-right from your discussion of international copyright with the British Government.

I must now apologize for my presumption—which, however, arises from good-will—and for the crude and hasty character of these comments. But I present them to one who is well able to sift the chaff from the grain, and so make the best of them.

I am,

My dear Mr. Lowell,

Yours very sincerely,

CHARLES READE.

VICARIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR,—There is a little stroke of business going to be done next Friday in the little town of Uxbridge, against which I beg to record a little protest. It is a public auction of a very small personalty professedly for the benefit of the Crown; but I apprehend the proceeds will go to another branch of the revenue. This sale and the threatened appropriation of certain money which was regarded by the deceased holder as trust-money, arose out of the following circumstances: The Rev. W. Orr, a Nonconformist minister, wrote, with his own hand, August 6, 1881, a will, containing a just and proper disposition of his small property. He bequeathed £50 to New College, Hampstead; £50 in three sums to three poor Christian women who had been his housekeepers at different periods; a few of his choicest books to clerical friends; his gold watch and chain to a Miss Ellen Orr; and the balance, after payment of expenses, to a Mrs. W. Orr. But as to a sum of £300, he did not bequeath it, but directed it to be returned to Miss Sarah Peters; and he appointed a Mr. Harris his executor. Mr. Orr showed this will at various times to several persons who knew his handwriting; and its contents became public. They even reached the three poor housekeepers; and that is a sad feature of the case at present. A few days before Mr. Orr died, a dear friend of his learned that his will was not attested, and advised him to repair that omission. Mr. Orr assented, but death surprised him before he could execute his declared purpose. He died February 7, 1882, deeply mourned by his own flock and revered by all good Christians in the town of Uxbridge.

He had no relations in law. His will was attested, in fact, by half a dozen witnesses, but not, in law, "by two," and therefore his property lay at the mercy of what cuckoos still call "the Crown," but accuracy—if such a bird of paradise existed in England—would call "the Revenue."

However, high-minded men, acting in the name of the Crown, have of late been very shy of confiscating even in cases of felony, and as Mr. Orr was not a felon, but only a saint and an Irishman, and therefore could not, ex vi terminorum, be a man of business, we hoped that the Lords of the Treasury would respect his solemn wishes, since they are as clear, and clearer, than if the will had been drawn by a lawyer's clerk and signed by two witnesses.

Accordingly the matter went before the Lords of the Treasury in two forms.

1. Sarah Peters petitioned for the return of her £300, as above.

2. Mr. Harris, executor, offered to act and discharge all the debts, expenses, and legacies, if the Lords of the Treasury would forego their claim.

Miss Peters tells me she has received no reply.

Mr. Harris has heard only from the Solicitor of the Treasury, ordering an immediate sale of the property—with one exception. His vicarious Majesty, the Solicitor for the Treasury, accords to the executor the right to withhold the choice books, but not the right to withhold the gold watch and chain, which were as solemnly bequeathed to a person specified as the books were. Now, I did not expect this Imperial edict and high-minded, though illogical, distinction to be signed by the chief of that bureau, for he has valued books far more than gold from his youth up until now. But, by what I can learn, the edict is not signed by any Lord of the Treasury whatever. It is clear on the face of things that neither the petition of Miss Peters nor the proposal of Mr. Harris has been laid before the Lords of the Treasury, nor considered by responsible men. Yet prompt action is taken at once by vicarious rapacity. There is no vice in any of the individuals concerned; it is merely a vicious system. The Solicitor of the Treasury would not pounce upon this property for his personal benefit; the Lords of the Treasury will bring their understandings and their consciences to bear on the matter—after a few months or years; and will probably decide in favour, not of English law, but of Continental law and universal morality, both of which support this deceased clergyman's will written by his own hand and shown to his friends. But, meantime, this harsh auction, ordered with inconvenient and indecorous haste, over a new-made grave—this present activity of vicarious greed and dead silence as to equity to come—have shocked and revolted a thousand mourners, and cruelly disappointed the humbler legatees as well as excited some public odium. I do not wish to inflame their feelings, but to suggest their removal. Therefore, as my views are always unintelligible to the clerks and secretaries, the duffers, the buffers, and the agents, of a public office, and I can no more get a manuscript past that incarnate rampart of "vicaria" than Miss Peters or Mr. Harris can, will you kindly allow me to approach the magnates of the Treasury by the only direct road I know—viz., the columns of a great public journal? I think, my lords, it would be well to let the people know without delay that you intend personally to consider the question whether or not, under the peculiar circumstances, any portion of this deceased clergyman's estate, except the amount of legacy duty, shall be finally appropriated by the State; and as regards the gold watch and chain, it is not too late to withdraw them from the coming sale; and I hope you will concede this favour, because, if they are thrown into the melting-pot of the Treasury next Friday, for not being hexaglot bibles, it may be difficult, even should Dr. Stevenson vouchsafe his aid, to reintegrate and reconstruct the component parts so as to recover their value to the legatee. To her they are not so many ounces of jeweller's gold, but the souvenir of one who never wasted time, yet lived for eternity.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

HANG IN HASTE, REPENT AT LEISURE:

A SUPPRESSED INDICTMENT.

FIRST LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

September 29th, 1877.

SIR,—I read with surprise and deep concern these lines in the Daily Telegraph, Sept. 27 :—

"The Jury asked the learned Judge if they could have a copy of the Indictment.

Mr. Justice Hawkins said, 'It would not help them in the least, written as it was in legal phraseology.'"

Now, if the judge had said, "Of course, gentlemen, you have as much right to examine the indictment as I have; but I warn you it is written in a jargon you are not intended to understand, but only to pronounce on, and so hang your fellow-creatures," there would have been no harm done, and a wholesome reprimand administered to the pedantic clique which words these public and terrible accusations in jargon and equivoques.

But I infer from your printed lines that the jury asked for a copy of the indictment to compare with the condensed evidence, and did not get one.

If so, the thing is monstrous, and vitiates the proceedings, creditable as they were in many respects. Consider, sir, the Crown is not above the law. The Crown, in a prosecution of this sort, comes before the jury, who are the country, in the general character of plaintiff and proceeds by indictment. That indictment is the grave and deliberate accusation which the Crown, to guard against the errors and defects of the tongue, submits in writing to the judge and the jury. It is a legal document which the judge is bound to criticise severely, on grounds of law. It is an allegation of facts and motives the jury is equally bound to dissect severely, and compare it in every particular with the evidence. Then, if there is a legal defect in it no bigger than a pin's head, the judge can upset the case in spite of its merits; and by the same rule—whatever the egotism of the legal clique may think—if it vary from the truth in its allegations of fact or of motives, which latter are the vital part of an indictment, it is the duty of the jury to throw it over, or in certain cases to reduce the verdict. And it does so happen that in cases of alleged homicide the indictment ought always to be dissected without mercy by the jury, for here, where the Crown ought to be most accurate, it is most apt to exaggerate. The truth is, that many years ago the legal advisers of the Crown thirsted for the blood of accused persons, and framed indictments accordingly; and such is the force of precedent that even now the Crown (or some attorney's clerk we are content to call by that name) is somewhat given to equivocating, exaggerating, and alleging more than can be proved, especially in the way of motives, which are the true sting of an indictment.

Whatever bad and unreasonable custom the legal clique, in dealing with the nation, may have introduced into our courts, it is clearly the duty of the Crown Solicitor to lay before the jury, who are the country, not the copy, but twelve copies, of the indictment, before the prosecuting counsel opens his lips. The judge has no better, no other, title to a copy of the indictment than each several jurymen has. As to the jargon of indictments, I have not found it so thick but that a plain man can pick out of the rigmarole the facts and motives whereof what we call "the Crown" accuses the prisoner. If it were, the matter should be looked into at once. All cliques, however respectable, are public enemies at odd times. Many years ago the country had to compel the clergy to read prayers "in a language understood of the people." Country v. Clique. Next we had to compel a clique to give us the laws of England in English. Country v. Clique. By and by we had to force a clique to drop the grossest compost of bad Latin and bad French nation ever groaned under, and to give us our law pleadings in English. Country v. Clique. And now, if it is seriously asserted that the Crown attacks the lives and liberties of Britons in a language not understood of the country, though the country has to judge both Crown and prisoner, it is time we copied ancestral wisdom, and put our foot on imbecility No. 4. Country v. Clique.

These, however, are after-considerations; at present I stand upon clear constitutional rights.

I understand the country demanded in open court a copy of that indictment, and did not get one.

I repeat that demand in your columns, in order that the country may see it, jargon, or no jargon, and compare it with the evidence in your columns. Of course I do not address my demand to any gentleman in particular. There are several copies in existence. No doubt some just man will awake from his slumbers and send you a copy. I earnestly hope to see it printed in extenso. Till then I forbear all comments on the case, because the issues are not before me, any more than they were before the country at the trial.

Your faithful servant,

CHARLES READE.

SECOND LETTER.

October 2nd, 1877.

SIR,—It is an old saying that one fool makes many. I have, however, discovered something more—viz., that one muddlehead sometimes makes a million, if he can get a popular journal to print him. I must take the world as it is; and in so grave and terrible a case, I dare not let your correspondent “A. B.” pass unanswered.

He is a lawyer, and does not pretend to deny that the jury have as good a right to a copy of the indictment as the judge has. But he says that in a large experience of criminal trials, he never knew a judge to hand a copy of the indictment to the jury. He adds, in the roundabout style of men who do not think clearly, what really comes to this, that as the judge talked a great deal and well, it did not matter to the jury what the Crown wrote.

Now, sir, this is no answer to me. I never said the judge was bound to volunteer a copy of the indictment to the jury; I never denied the malpractice of the courts, and that the Crown Solicitor does not hand twelve copies to the jury, though it is his duty. I have never denied that twelve unguarded jurymen, new to the courts, often let the legal clique trepan them into trying a case without studying the written issues. But ignorant persons can only forego their own rights. Their ignorance does not forfeit the rights of the informed. What we have to do with is a jury which acted on their rights and their duty. They were just enough, wise enough, and wary enough, to demand, at a critical period of the trial, a copy of the very words of the Crown upon which, and not upon the judge's words, they had to say, "Guilty or not Guilty." The judge put off this their just and proper demand, and gave a reason which, weighed against the wise and proper reasons of the jury and against their constitutional right, sounds almost like mere levity. By so doing, he left them to give their verdict on his own spoken words alone, and not on the written words of his Sovereign and theirs. This is the case. I think it is without precedent and vitiates the proceedings. If there is a precedent, however, it will be found and quoted. But the country will expect it to be a precedent that fits the case, without shuffling or equivocation, and meantime I hope the execution will not be hurried, but time given for the country and the Home Secretary to consider this fatal blot on the proceedings. Indeed, the matter ought to be noticed in Parliament, especially in the House of Commons.

I am, Sir, your faithful servant,

CHARLES READE.

THIRD LETTER.

October 3rd, 1877.

Sir,—Mr. Abbott says the author of "It is Never too Late to Mend," is soft-hearted. Not a bit of it. He is only harder-headed than certain Englishmen. He proved in the story cited above that the honest man who kills a thief in prison contrary to law is a greater criminal than the thief. That was logic ; not compassion. Mr. Abbott now reminds us that pettifogging judges, looking too closely into indictments, have quashed them on trumpery grounds of law, in spite of evidence. This is notorious. But what is the inference? are the judges not to be allowed a copy of the indictment? He has proved that, or he has proved nothing; for no jury ever defeated justice with a quibble on the indictment. In spite of these occasional abuses, constitutional rights must not be tampered with. A judge is as much entitled to a copy of the indictment as even the jury are, who have to try the issues. What we have to do with is a new thing—the separate indictments of four persons, submitted to the judge, but not seen by the jury, though they asked for them, and the jury delivering a sort of lump verdict on unseen indictments, in which, perhaps, the Crown did not lump four very different cases in one without any discriminating words whatever. Who knows? The indictments are still suppressed. Another of your correspondents draws me out by malicious misinterpretation. He puts violent and cruel words into my mouth, and is reckless enough, with my sober lines before him, to pretend that I compare Mr. Justice Hawkins to Judge Jeffries. Of course such unscrupulous people can compel a man to notice them. The learned judge has been my counsel, and I have profited by his abilities. I was never so unfortunate as to have him against me, in court. I hope I never shall. The jury asked by word of mouth for the indictment. He replied, without much reflection, by word of mouth. His reply was unfortunate, as many a hasty reply of my own has been, and, as its effect was to deprive the jury of their constitutional rights, I think it vitiates the proceedings. As to the merits of the case, is it fair of any man to tell the public what I think when I myself have been so careful not to rush hastily into that question? As it happens, I approve some things in the learned judge's summing-up in spite of the objection taken to those particulars by others. It is only in one part of the subject I do not at present agree with him. Even then, I desire to think well before I write, for no man feels more than I do the responsibility to God and man of every one who uses the vast power of a popular journal in a case of life and death.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

FOURTH LETTER.

October 10th, 1877.

SIR,—When a woman of property is half-starved by people who are eating her bread, and her husband, with his paramour, lives but one mile distant, on the money of their injured benefactress, and the victim dies covered with vermin and weighing about five stone, the wildfire of indignation will, I hope, always run through every vein of the country, and the judges share the just wrath of the gentry and of the millions who work so hard to feed their own helpless charges.

But great wrath, even when just, is still a fever of the mind, and cannot discriminate. Whilst the heart is still hot with that fire which has been so truly called “a passing frenzy” (ira brevis furor), the culpable ones seem criminal, the criminal ones seem monsters, and “our great revenge has stomach for them all.”

I, who write these lines, am but a man recovering fast from a fever in a nation which is recovering slowly but surely. I recover fast, because, from my youth, I have been trained in a great school to reason closely and discriminate keenly, and armed with Oxford steel against the tricks and sophistries of rhetoric, against the derangement of dates (which single artifice will turn true facts into lies), against those fatal traps, equivoques in language, and against all gaps in evidence, however small they may appear to the unwary. I grieve to say that I receive shoals of insulting letters, telling me I am a Whalleyite and a novelist, and so disqualified. This draws a few unwilling words from me to disarm prejudice. I declared against Orton in the Daily News before ever the Crown tried him. I then laid down the scientific principle which governs his case, the doctrine of multiplied coincidences; and, though I write novels at one time, I can write logic at another, and when I write a novel I give the public my lowest gifts, but I give them my highest when I write in a great journal upon life and death and justice. But the best thing the public, and those who govern it, can do, will be to go by things, not names, to sift my arguments as closely as I shall analyse the evidence and the hasty inferences in the greatest judicial error of modern times.

The verdict against the Stauntons and Rhodes is a hodge-podge, in which the legally criminal and the legally culpable are confounded, and both sets of legal culprits are confounded with the moral culprits, who are clear of the case by the law of England and the rules of evidence that bind the Central Criminal Court.

Few observers of mankind will deny me this, which, indeed, reads like a truism :—

Where A, B, and C, confound four things, and D, on the same evidence, distinguishes them, it is a thousand to one that D is right, and A, B, and C are wrong.

The position becomes even stronger when we find that A, B, and C have been subject to several confusing influences. It may be worth while to point out the confusing processes that muddled the jury, of which processes some rise from the habitual malpractices of this particular court, and others from faults that have been imported into it for this single occasion.

PROCESSES OF CONFUSION.

1. The court, for its convenience, tried four dissimilar cases in the lump, and the four prisoners stood together at the bar.

2. Being near and dear to each other, and involved in one danger, they suffered and sympathised openly.

3. Twelve unguarded men looked on, and, deluded by the senses, which are always stronger than the judgment in untrained minds, said to themselves, "they are all in one boat." So they were—in one family boat, not one legal boat. But the family boat being in a legal dock, these good souls took it for a legal boat directly.

4. The four separate indictments, with their curious counts, would have tended to cure this. But here the malpractices of the court came in with another process of confusion.

By the law of England the arraignment of a prisoner consists of three parts: (a) He is called to the bar by his name; (b) the indictment is read to him, every syllable of it; (c) he is invited to plead to the indictment, and no other form of words, and he has a right to plead guilty to one count, and not guilty to another count; and, if he is legally culpable, but not criminal, it is the wisest thing he can do.

This being done by the Clerk of Arraignment, the paper that Clerk has read from becomes, from the universal practice of all our courts, the property of the jury so long as that trial lasts.

But the Clerk of Arraigns, by a modern malpractice, broke this just and necessary law, and the judge let him. So each prisoner was grossly robbed of his right to admit one count and deny another, and the jury were grossly robbed of a copy of the indictment, though the mere preliminary jury, whose responsibility is so much less, had one to study and find a true Bill on; and though it is not merely the right but the duty of the jury, as laid down by Blackstone himself very clearly, to study the indictment very closely and to find "guilty" on one count, and "not guilty" on another, and to carry discrimination even further, for they can find guilty on one half of a divisible count and acquit upon the other.

5. Law, justice, and common sense having thus been defied by the Central Criminal Court, and the great written instrument of discrimination withheld from them contrary to law, they were manipulated and confused by a rhetorician on the Bench, who picked out the highest count and ignored the others, and with gentle hand extinguished their one faint gleam of incipient discrimination, and left no doubt to the jury in a case crammed with doubts; which was unprecedented.

The result corresponded with all these co-operating processes.

The judge laid down the law that whoever has by law, or takes upon himself, the charge of a helpless person and does not give her enough to live upon is guilty of murder by omission. He did not say whoever has one-fourth of the charge, for that is not the law.

THE CHARGE.

UNDER this ruling, on which I have something to say hereafter, the jury on the evidence contrived to see four persons, all of whom had either by law or their own act "the charge" of Harriet Staunton, and all saw her pine to death and let her pine to death.

Now let all men, in whose minds the very landmarks of truth are not obliterated, look on that picture conjured up by a jury under several processes of confusion along with this picture which the evidence reveals to a discriminating eye.

Patrick Staunton, a committer of a crime, responsible for Harriet Staunton's life by a pecuniary contract with Louis. He docks her food, strikes her, terrifies and strikes his wife for interfering, &c. The evidence suggests that if the man had died in 1876, Harriet Staunton might be alive now. He comes under the judge's ruling. He had "the charge." This is the only committer of them all. Yet the jury can see nothing exceptional in his position. We now step down to a much lower grade of crime.

THE MERE OMITTERS.

At the head is Mrs. Patrick Staunton, a grown-up woman, experienced, and no fool. Her neglect of Harriet is prima facie barbarous; but it transpires that there was conjugal influence and coercion. The woman encountered blows in defence of the victim. The deterring effect of those blows, and her pregnancy, cannot be exactly estimated; nor is it necessary. The law, already disposed to assume conjugal influence, except in an indisputable case of murder, is amply satisfied with the admissions made on this head, and she is not a criminal, but a culpable offender. Two years' imprisonment. The next ommitter is Clara Brown. She slept in the same room with the victim; allowed the vermin to accumulate; saw her sufferings more than Mrs. P. Staunton: filled her own belly and let her perish; nor did she show any positive goodness of heart, as the elder woman did once or twice. I mean she never faced a blow nor got an angry word, and she never told a soul till the Crown Solicitor inspired her with higher sentiments. On the other hand, she was young, inexperienced, and stupid; and, though she saw most of the victim, never anticipated her death, which blindness in her rouses a suspicion that the whole set were much greater fools and smaller villains than they look. We now take a step in law which is as wide as the step down from the one committer to the four ommitters. We go out of the house. We don't even go next door, but to another house a mile distant, where two self-indulgent adulterers were hiding themselves from Harriet Staunton and absorbed in adultery, which was made smooth by Patrick's control of the injured wife. I never knew how low the human understanding could sink till I saw a jury who could confound this situation with that of Mrs. Patrick Staunton and Clara Brown, two people living in the house where Harriet Staunton pined on the first floor. That first floor Louis Staunton and Alice Rhodes avoided from self-indulgent motives, that are out of the case. Of these two persons, the law never had any hold on Rhodes. A mistress living in one house is not bound to provide food for a wife living in another. Rhodes is out of the case. Louis Staunton, until some day in August, 1876, was deep in the case. But the judge, in order to make hostile comments on his niggardliness, let in as evidence that he made a contract with Patrick Staunton of this kind—Patrick was to receive Harriet in his own house, and receive twenty shillings per week. Louis was a mean scoundrel to offer so small a sum, but a rustic labourer and eight children live on less. It crushes the charge of murder as completely as twenty pounds a week would. It is a contract in which both contracting parties contemplated, not the death, but the indefinite life of Harriet Staunton. Its very niggardliness proves that on behalf of Louis Staunton. A man can transfer his legal responsibility. It is done daily. The legal responsibility of Louis Staunton passed by that pecuniary contract to Patrick as much as did the responsibility of that mother, who handed her child for five shillings a week to a baby-farmer, which baby-farmer neglected the child till it died a bag of bones, and was tried by Sir James Hawkins two days after the Stauntons. (See The Daily Telegraph, Oct. 1). The attempts made to drag Rhodes into the case at all, and to drag Louis back into it after admission of that contract, are pure sophistry and equivocation, as I shall show in the proper place. Meantime here is the true picture.

1. Committer and criminal.

2. Culpable omitters; one condemned to die, one walking about London.

3. and 4. Two vile moral omitters clear of the crime, but relieved by the lawyers of all their ill-gotten money, defended with admirable speeches, but worse defended on the evidence than they could have defended themselves, and condemned to die.

The blunder has been brought about partly by the recent malpractices, and the inherent defects, of the Central Criminal Court, whose system is so faulty that it never gets below the surface of a case, and is the worst instrument for the discovery of truth in Europe; and partly from special vices and errors, that found their way into the case, and surprise the whole legal profession, so opposed are they to precedent, and to the best traditions, and most sober habits, of the court. These it will be my next duty to analyse closely, but I think I can hit upon a briefer method than I have been able to pursue in this letter.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

FIFTH LETTER.

October 12th, 1877.

SIR,—Were I, who denounce an indiscriminating verdict upon four immoral egotists, to endorse the indiscriminating censure levelled at the judge who tried the case, I should exceed the error I condemn, for I should be morally unjust to the good, he has only been legally unjust to a portion of the bad.

I declare then, that he had no power to prevent one of the omitters from giving evidence against the others, whose mouths were closed by an iniquity of the law which is itself doomed to death; nor had he any right to disparage her whole evidence, but only to reject one part and sift the rest with keen suspicion; and, when he directed the jury to prefer the opinion of Doctors who had seen the body, to that of Doctors who had not, and bade the jury observe the ugly circumstance that Harman, the doctor who had watched the post-mortem examination on behalf of the defendants, was not called for the defence, he did his duty to the jury, guided by innumerable precedents, which not only justified, but bound him. He did not make the rules of evidence: he found the rules of evidence, and very wise they are. In a word, I will not wilfully object to anything but what defies precedent, and the habits of our other judges, and every one of their predecessors, whose name their country honours.

1. The judge laid down the law thus, as affecting the only count of a suppressed indictment which he permitted the jury to try; "every person who is under a legal duty, whether such duty be imposed by the law, or imposed by contract, or by the act of taking charge, wrongfully, or otherwise, of another person, to provide the necessaries of life, every such person is criminally responsible for the culpable neglect of that duty. And if the person so neglected, is, from age, insanity, health, or any other cause, unable to take care of himself, and by reason of that neglect, death ensues, the crime is murder."

Now this is the law if you don't stretch it, and try to catch more fish than the law allows. It is the law as it lies in the Text-Books, and is there applied to a single person, having the sole legal charge.

But as regards these four offenders it is too broad and loose, and is not the law of England as appears in the cases to which those very text-books refer, and in fifty other cases, well known, though not reported by lawyers, but only word for word by the newspapers. These are shunned by the lawyers; they are invaluable; but then they are not published and sold by that sacred clique.

However, the cases of criminal omission, though pitifully reduced in number by that childish prejudice, are, I think fatal to this new theory of criminal responsibility in the highest degree attaching to persons who have not the sole charge in law of the murdered person.

What will my readers think, and what will the Home Secretary think, when I tell him that to find in the books a verdict of murder by omission I must go back to ninety-seven years—to a time when jurymen were so used to shed blood like water by statute law that they naturally applied even the common law with a severity that is now out of date.

I, who with these eyes have seen a boy of eighteen hanged for stealing a horse, though the jury could have saved him, and the judge could have saved him with a word, am not disposed to rate beyond its value the case of "Rex v. Squires," on which Sir J. Hawkins, I think, relies, still less to stretch it ad infinitum, where the jury that hanged him restricted it so closely.

In 1790 the Crown indicted Squires and his wife for murder. They had starved a young apprentice, and beaten him cruelly. The wife, as to the beating, could not by law prove conjugal influence, for she had beaten the boy in her husband's absence, which bars that plea. The post-mortem, however, revealed starvation, and not the boy's wounds, to be the cause of death. The jury found Squires guilty of murder; but they held that Mrs. Squires had not in this, as she had in the blows, acted independently of her husband.

She had not intercepted any food her husband had given her for the boy.

If this case is to be acted on in our day, at least we should not garble, and take the sanguinary half. The jury acquitted Mrs. Squires, a far worse woman than Mrs. P. Staunton, and they acquitted her logically. In a case of omission they could not convict the husband capitally but by loading him with the whole charge, and the whole criminality of a joint act. Does this case, looked into and understood, support the new theory of criminal responsibility, infinitely divisible, without diminution of guilt.

A leading case of our own day, and therefore a better guide for us, is "The Queen v. Bubb and Hook." Elizabeth Bubb, was a widow with two children, and sister to Richard Hook's wife, deceased. Hook invited her into his house, and gave her money to keep the family. She fed and clothed her own family, and half starved the poor dead sister's. She carried her cruelty so far that the neighbours remonstrated often, but Hook looked calmly on, and did not mind. By steady degrees this fiendish woman murdered Hook's youngest child by starvation and cold. She was indicted for murder. The jury did not conceal their horror, but they used their right, and reduced the crime to manslaughter; but, as that verdict opens the door to lenient sentences, they guarded the judge in a way that shows how wise twelve plain men can be when each of them thinks for himself. They brought it in "aggravated manslaughter." Hook was tried for manslaughter at the same assize. As he had supplied Bubb with means, there was nothing against him but his apathy and neglect of his pining child, and his turning a deaf ear to remonstrances. It was left to the jury to decide whether this was culpable neglect, or stupid neglect in a father—not an outsider, like Rhodes. They decided for stupid neglect, and acquitted Hook. Here is the same principle. They were resolved to put the saddle on the right horse, and not upon two horses. Will my readers pause, and compare the guilt of the heartless, relentless fiend Bubb—sole instigator, sole executor of a deadly deed, in spite of remonstrances—with the case of Mrs. Patrick Staunton, a wife, and under influence, who in her moments of conscience resisted the cruelty, and was overpowered.

If you divide an apple into four pieces, you have four pieces, but not four apples. If, in a case of omission, you could really divide the legal charge, and the highest criminal responsibility, the effect would not be what Sir J. Hawkins told the jury the effect would be—to subdivide and fritter away the criminal responsibility till it should escape the lash of the law, and meet no punishment but public reprobation.

Example—two Welsh parents had an imbecile girl, who professed sanctity and fasting, and the old people made their money out of her. Incredulous doctors demanded a test. Parents consented. Doctors watched night and day, and went at the first plunge much deeper than the Stauntons; for they stopped all supplies dead short. They killed her quick amongst them. The doctors sat round her bed and saw the lamp of life burn out in eight days. Vulgar curiosity does not excuse deliberate murder. See now if by any quibbling or evasion the conduct of the parents can be taken out of murder—as the law was laid down for the Stauntons, see above—or the doctors cleared of manslaughter. Clean stoppage of food is the short cut to murder, with the goal in sight all the way.

Insufficient supply of food is an uncertain road to manslaughter. The victim may get used to it. Luigi Cornaro achieved a vast longevity by no other means than insufficient nutriment arrived at by degrees. If divided responsibility leaves seven people equally responsible, why were not those parents and doctors all hung?

2. "IMPOSED BY LAW, OR IMPOSED BY CONTRACT."

True. But throughout this case he withheld from the jury that when the law and lawful contract are opposed, contract prevails. In order to submit to the jury some just comments on the niggardly wretch, Louis Staunton, and the 20s. he agreed to pay Patrick to house and board his wife, he let in the paltry contract as evidence; yet he withheld from the jury the immediate legal effect of the contract. This was to give Patrick the sole charge of the wife, and the sole criminal responsibility of the highest degree.

The legal responsibility passed clean out of Louis by passing into Patrick. Had Louis failed to pay weekly, Patrick could have sued him.

Whether a responsibility originally so sacred as a husband's could not be revived partially, and in a lower form, by Louis constantly visiting his wife and actually seeing her pine away, and whether this would not make him guilty of manslaughter is another matter, and one I shall deal with under another head; but I complain that the judge withheld his legal knowledge from the jury whenever it could serve a prisoner, of which this is one example.

3.—Another is his dead silence as to Mrs. P. Staunton's legal position as a wife, and the influence of her husband upon her as well as on Rhodes—an influence the law is not unwilling to assume, though of course it can be rebutted, as when Mrs. Manning was proved to be the instigator of a joint crime. But here the husband had by contract the sole legal charge, like Squires in 1790.

4.—Illegal and improper evidence was admitted, such as no prisoner with his mouth closed has ever been assassinated by in my time. Clara Brown was allowed to depose to the existence of a letter written by Louis Staunton to Alice Rhodes in August, 1876. That was allowable, for Rhodes admitted having received and lost a letter. But now comes the legal wrong. She was allowed to own herself a thief as regarded that particular letter, and also what the old judges called "a spoliator of evidence."

As regarded that one letter, I mean she was allowed to depose that she had burnt it wilfully, and with her own hand, and yet she was permitted to take advantage of her own suppression of the real letter, to give by memory or imagination just so many words as the Crown Solicitor, who got up the case, thought might suffice to hang Louis Staunton by an equivocation pointing to murder, and an admission of long criminal intimacy, to prove adultery before as well as after marriage. "Spoliation of evidence" does not figure much in the text-books. You must go wide and deep to find the hundreds of cases that lie behind all the older maxims of law. "Assume everything to the discredit of a spoliator of evidence" is the maxim, and the person who destroys any written document divining its importance is certainly a spoliator of evidence. But if the good, though almost obsolete, phrase be objected to, I will resign it, and stick to the substance. Why, even at Nisi Prius, if a witness, to decide a case, swore he received a letter from a party, who could not be put in the box, and proved that he really had received a letter from that person of some kind or other, would he be allowed to say "I burned the letter, seeing its importance; the writer cannot be called to contradict me, so I remember enough of the contents to win this verdict, £50,000, for the party who puts me in the box"—would not the judge hesitate to let the jury's mind be prejudiced by hearing this witness's garbled quotations? If another hand had burned it, well and good; but surely not when he had burned it himself, and so put the court entirely at the mercy of partial quotation and misquotation. I am of opinion, subject to the decision of the judges—and it is quite time they sat to review criminal cases—that this sham reproduction of a selected and garbled part of a written letter the witness had wilfully destroyed was legally inadmissible against two prisoners whose mouths were sealed.

I shall show in my next that this violation, not of some pedantic rule of evidence, but of its very fundamental principles, lets a whole vein of romantic error into the case, and shall expose generally the false system by which the order of the facts was dislocated and the facts falsified.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

I beg to acknowledge with thanks some insulting letters from people who don't sign their names, and some encouraging ones from ladies and gentlemen who do.

SIXTH LETTER.

October 13th, 1877.

SIR,—In reply to reasonable comments let me say I have not put forward that branch of law which concerns the aiding and abetting any kind of murder, whether by commission or omission, because the judge did not lay that down to the jury, and he was bound to do so if that was the law he relied on.

He never treated Louis Staunton as an "accessory before the fact," which under this head of law was the only cap that could be made to fit him. He never told the jury what precise evidence the law demands against a man who has made a niggardly contract contemplating, by its very niggardliness, the indefinite life of the victim, etc a jury is to pronounce that he did "procure, counsel, command and abet" the murder of that person.

Of course no lawyer will pretend that a man living out of the house of murder can be accessory at the fact, or what the text books call "a principal in the first degree;" nor will any lawyer deny that if he lives out of the house, but procures, counsels, commands, or abets the murder, beyond doubt, he can be an accessory before the fact, or a principal in the second degree. But there must be high evidence and direct evidence, and if spoken or written words are relied on they must be addressed to the very person who does the murder, and must be unequivocal. A doubtful phrase addressed to Rhodes, who took no part in the murder, is not at all the kind of evidence required by all the books and all the cases. See the word "accessory" in any text book or report whatever.

THE FACTS.

In our Criminal Court, where the prisoners, the only people who really know the ins and outs of the case, are not allowed to open their lips, and correct any of the shallow guesswork that is going on about them in their astonished ears, one great abuse like that I denounced in my last letter is sure to let in many more. Clara Brown, the one witness on whom the case for the Crown really depends, was allowed by the judge to swear she had destroyed a letter, and yet to cite so much of it, correctly or incorrectly, as fitted the two horns of the prosecution. That abuse led at once to another. This model witness was allowed another privilege the rules of evidence do not grant—viz., to argue the case. For this the defendants are indebted to their counsel.

He asked whether she understood the sentence about Harriet being "out of the way" to refer to her death. To this question she replied "Yes."

French counsel surprised by a prosecution would immediately have had a personal conference with the prisoners, and would have asked the girl questions that would have greatly benefited the prisoners. The jury, hearing a witness swear to an interpretation of a doubtful phrase, were not aware this was not evidence, and ought severely to be rejected from their minds. So one abuse led to another, and it is not too much to say that this imaginary letter with the witness's black-hearted interpretation is the rope that is to hang Louis Staunton.

Well, such a rope of sand has never hung an Englishman in my day. It is pitiable to see how little, if anything, that can even by courtesy be called mental power, was brought to bear by twelve men of the world on this quotation of a letter without its contents, one of the stalest frauds in the world and also in literature of every kind, especially controversial theology.

Permit me to test this imaginary extract from what was proved, I think, to be a real letter, by one or two sure methods of which I am not the inventor.

Have those twelve gentlemen counted the number of words a young servant girl swore she had remembered in their exact order for nine months or more, though she had burned the letter, and the subject had never been recalled to her mind till she fell into the hands of the prosecution?

The words are sixty-two in number.

"My own darling,—I was very sorry to see you cry when I left you. It seems as though it never must be, but there will be a time when Harriet will be out of the way, and we shall be happy together. Dear Alice, you must know how I love you by this time. We have been together two years now."

Now, sir, even if those fatal words about a time when Harriet will be out of the way were ever written without some explanatory context, I think the jury ought to have been throughout solemnly warned and guarded against the illogical interpretation of them. The just rule of interpretation is that you should always prefer a literal to a vague or metaphorical interpretation. The words "out of the way" mean out of the way; they don't mean dead. A man can say "dead," and if Rhodes was projecting murder with him, why should he not have said so?

The next rule is, that you prefer the interpretation which the writer himself confesses by his own act, and the next is, that you prefer the interpretation that is first fulfilled in order of time. Now, it was Louis, the writer of the words, who took a farm soon after, settled Harriet with Patrick, and so got her out of the way, and lived in smooth adultery with Rhodes, whereas it was other people who killed Harriet Staunton, and nine months afterwards. But I shall now show the extract as sworn to was never written.

1st objection.—It is too long, and too short, which two traits can never meet in a genuine extract.

A. Too long for a servant girl to remember, word for word, nine months after hearing it.

B. Too short. Louis Staunton was not preparing his own prosecution. It was not on the cards of mere accident that he should furnish in sixty-two words two equivocal expressions—one establishing a long adulterous intercourse of which there is no corroborative proof, but the reverse, and another quibble projecting distant murder, of which there is no corroborative proof, since Harriet was well used for months after.

2. The line reminding her she had been his mistress for two years is worded by a woman, and not by Staunton or any man. Decent women like Clara Brown have a delicate vocabulary unknown to men. "We have been together," which means everything the prosecution wanted, but says nothing at all, is a woman's word for criminal connection.

3. The statement itself is not true, and from that you must argue backward against the genuineness of the quotation, since he would not say this to a girl who knew better.*

4. The witness could remember nothing but her lesson: sixty-two consecutive words, all neat and telling, and meeting the two great views of the prosecution; but, that done, a blank—a total blank; not six consecutive words. This is barefaced. Daniel Defoe would have managed better. He would have armed the witness with ten consecutive words on some matter quite foreign to the objects of the prosecution. The quotation is fabricated.

The process has nothing exceptional in it, nor is there any one to blame, except the Court, for letting in parole evidence about a written document destroyed by the witness herself.

Allow 10,000 such witnesses, and, if the case is ably prepared, you must, in the very nature of things, have 10,000 inaccurate quotations, all leaning towards the side that calls the witness.

The people who get up a prosecution have but one way of dealing with such a witness. She comes to them remembering a word here or there. She is advised to speak the truth and take time. But, as the conference proceeds, she is asked whether she happens to remember anything of such a kind? She is very ductile, and forces her memory a bit in the direction she instinctively sees is desired. The very person who is examining her with an ex parte view does not see that she is so wax-like as she is.

Add a small grain of self-deception on both sides, and a mixture of truth and falsehood comes into the unwary and most inconsistent court, which stops Louis Staunton's mouth, yet lets in a worse kind of evidence than the prisoner's own, viz., this horrible hodge-podge of memory, imagination, and prompting, which, in the very nature of things, and by the mere infirmity of the human mind, must be a lie.

That a man should die only because he is tried in England. Bring your minds to bear on this, my countrymen. If an ignorant man, like this Staunton, is defendant in a suit for fifty-one pounds, he can go into the witness box and explain all the errors of the plaintiff, if any; but if he is tried for his life, which is dearer to every man than all the money in the world, he is not allowed to say one word to the jury, if he has counsel. Now, in France he may speak after his counsel have done muddling his case, but here with heartless mockery, when Ignorance all round has hanged him, he is allowed to speak—To whom? To the judge. On what? The nice quibbles of the law, but not on facts or motives—that being the one thing he can never do, and this being the thing he could generally do, and flood the groping Court with light, especially as to his true motives and the extenuating circumstances of his case. By this system the blood-thirsty murderer, who chooses his time, and slays swiftly in the dark, gains an advantage he cannot have in the wiser Courts of Europe. But God help the malefactor who is not an habitual criminal, or one of the deepest dye, but a mixed sinner, who has glided from folly into sin, and from sin into his first crime, and who has been fool as well as villain. His mouth is closed, and all the extenuating circumstances that mouth could always reveal are hidden with it, or, as in this case, grossly and foully perverted into aggravating circumstances.

This is very unfair. The Nation will see it some day. At present what is to be done? After all, thank God, it is a free country, and one in which bad law is sometimes corrected by just men.

To all such I appeal against the rope of sand I have had to untwist in this letter.

The Post has enabled me to do something more: to resist foul play and garbled quotations and those most dangerous of all lies, equivoques in language, such as "Harriet out of the way," the very kind of lies Holy Writ ascribes to Satan, and the great poets of every age have described as hellish, which they are.

I resolved to give Louis Staunton, what that den of iniquity and imbecility, the Central Criminal Court, did not give him, one little chance of untwisting that rope of sand, although he has the misfortune not to be a Frenchman. I conveyed a short letter to Mr. Louis Staunton through the proper authorities, requesting him to try and remember the entire matter of a certain letter he had unquestionably written to Alice Rhodes in August, 1876, and to send it to me verbatim. Some delay took place while my letter was submitted to authorities outside the gaol, but Fair Play prevailed, and I now append the letter to my own, which is of less value. I send it all the same, because I have looked narrowly into that of Staunton's and I don't see any of that self-evident mendacity, I have felt it my duty to point out in the garbled quotation the rope of sand. This letter, at all events, may be true. For here I see youth, with its selfish vices, not looking months and months ahead, either for good or bad, but getting Harriet out of the way without a metaphor, to enjoy the sweet vice his self-indulgent soul was filled with, and not with long cold-blooded schemes of murder such as belong to more hardened natures than this, who, we learn from the Crown itself, and on oath, sat down and cried because his wife upset the house. The following is

LOUIS STAUNTON'S LETTER.

MAIDSTONE GAOL, October 11th, 1877.

SIR,—I duly received your letter of the 9th inst., and now beg to reply to it. The letter in question I wrote to Alice Rhodes on or about August 17, 1876. The facts are these: I had several times promised to take Alice Rhodes down to Brighton for a week, but had been prevented from doing so. But on Saturday, August 14, Mrs. Staunton, Alice Rhodes, and myself, went down to Cudham, for the purpose of leaving Mrs. Staunton there, that we might go to Brighton on the Tuesday; but on the Monday I received a telegram to say my father was worse. My brother and myself immediately came up to London, leaving Alice Rhodes and Mrs. Staunton at Cudham. I then wrote her this letter:—

“MY OWN DARLING,

“I know you will be sorry to hear that my poor dear father passed away yesterday. This is a sad blow to me, but we all have our troubles. Our trip must now be put off again. It seems as if it is not to be; but I will arrange another time to get Harriet out of the way; so you must not be disappointed. I shall have to remain down home for a few days, so Harriet had better stop down with you."

I believe I have now given you word for word what I said in this letter. I have thought well over it, and cannot remember saying anything more. What I meant by "It seems as if it is not to be," was our going to Brighton, and of getting "Harriet out of the way," that she might not know anything about it.

This is the whole truth of the letter.

I am, Sir,

Yours obediently,

LOUIS STAUNTON.

CHARLES READE, ESQ.

The Public is to understand that I deal fairly with the Powerful Journal which has done me the honour to allow me to express boldly my unalterable convictions. I do not write letters and say "Thus said Staunton;" I tender you his handwriting, begging you to do me the honour to keep it, and show it to few or many as you think proper. I do not lead witnesses as I think Clara Brown was led—unconsciously, no doubt. My short letter, to which this is a reply, lies in Maidstone Gaol. I can't remember what I write, like this young sinner, nor imagine what other people write—like Miss Brown plus an attorney's clerk. But I am sure it is a short line, just asking the man to send the truth. He looks on himself as a dying man; has no hope of saving himself; and I think he has come pretty near the truth in his letter.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

P.S.—Now that I have opened the dumb creature's mouth, which that beastly court, the disgrace of Europe, had closed, who doubts the real meaning of the letter, and that the writer had Adultery in view, and had not Homicide.

THE LEGAL VOCABULARY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE."

SIR,—Now those swift-footed hares, my eloquent contemporaries, have galloped over Diblanc's trial, may I ask you, in the name of humanity, to let the tortoise crawl over it with his microscopic eye? Where female culprits are to be judged, a patient drudge, who has studied that sex profoundly in various walks of life, including Diblanc's, is sometimes a surer exponent of facts than is a learned lawyer. I will keep strictly within the limits of the legal defence. The Crown used Diblanc as its witness to the killing, and this, by a rule of law which is inexorable, and governs alike a suit or an indictment, let in the prisoner's explanations as evidence. But there are degrees of evidence; what she said against herself was first-class evidence; what she said favourable to herself was low evidence, to be received when it is contradicted neither by a living witness nor a clear fact. I keep within this circle, traced by the judge himself, simply premising that I have seen many a prisoner acquitted on his own explanation of motives, thus made admissible, though poor, evidence, by the prosecutor.

Now did the criminal seek the victim, or the victim her? Where was the crime committed? In the kitchen. And what is the kitchen? It is a poor man's cottage on the ground-floor of a gentleman's house. No paper—no carpet—stone floor—it is made like a servant's home out of contempt; but the result of that contempt is, that the female domestic feels at home in it, soul and body. It is the servant's house, and the cook's castle and workshop. To come and insult her there galls her worse than in the gentlefolk's part. What a lady feels if a cook walks up into the drawing-room to affront her, that the cook feels if the mistress comes down into her castle to affront her. But a kitchen is something else—it is an arsenal of deadly weapons, with every one of which the cook is familiar. The principal are—a hatchet to chop wood, a rolling-pin, a steel to sharpen knives, a cleaver, an enormous poker, a bread knife, carving knife, &c. Into this cook's castle and arsenal of lethal weapons comes Diblanc's mistress on a Sunday forenoon, when even a cook is entitled to a little bit of peace and some little reduction of her labour, if possible, and gives an inconsiderate order. The cook says there's no need for that; dinner is not till seven. This offends the mistress, and she threatens to discharge her on the spot. The cook says she will go directly if her month's wages are paid her. "No," says the mistress, "I will keep you your time; but I will make you suffer." Here there is a lacuna; but the climax was that the mistress called this poor hard-working woman, in her castle and workshop, a prostitute, and dwelt upon the epithet. Then the cook, goaded to fury, took, not one of the murderous weapons close at hand, but sprang at her mistress's throat, and gripped it with such fury that she broke the poor creature's jaw and throttled her on the spot, and probably killed her on the spot, whatever she may have said to the contrary. The deed done, the criminal is all amazement, vacillation, and uncertainty in word and deed. Her deeds: She carries the body wildly here and there; she puts a rope round its neck in a mad attempt to pass the act off for suicide; she resolves on flight; she has not the means; she casts her eyes round, and sees the safe with money in it; she breaks it open, and takes enough for her purpose; she does not pillage; she steals the means of flight; she robs in self-defence. Her words: "I leave for Paris this evening." Then a horror falls on her like a thunderclap. "No, I shall never see Paris again, not even my parents." Is there nothing human in this sudden cry of a poor savage awaking to her crime? "I shall try to leave for America." So, then, she goes out intending to sail to America, and goes just where she did not mean to go—to Paris. She gets there, and instantly pays a just debt with the money she no longer needed to save her life. In other words, she is no more a real thief than a real murderer, as the common-sense of mankind understands the words. With the light thus reflected by her subsequent conduct, all vacillation and inability to carry out a design, I return to the homicide and its true interpretation.

Fact goes by precedent as well as law, and, strange to say, lawyers, those slaves of precedent, often forget this. Now, what does experience or precedent teach us with regard to the murder of adults by adults? Is the open hand the weapon murder selects? It is the weapon cold-blooded robbery has often selected to avoid murder. But is it the weapon murder has often selected? Certainly not. But Diblanc's defence rests on far stronger ground. The point of her defence is this: She stood in an arsenal of deadly weapons, and yet avoided them, and used the non-lethal weapon—her bare hands—being maddened to fury and burning for revenge, but not positively intending to murder either before the attack or at the moment of the attack. These facts, minutely examined, tear the theory of "premeditation" up by the roots; but you cannot tear that theory up by the roots without displacing the theory of "intention," and letting in the defendant's evidence that she did not intend to kill Madame Riel. And this brings me naturally to the nature and extent of the provocation that stung her to fury.

Mr. Baron Channell says that no mere words can by provocation reduce wilful killing to manslaughter. Granted; but I think this applies only to killing with lethal weapons. Where two things combine—where A receives a foul provocation in language from B, and, avoiding the lethal weapons close to his hand, kills B with the bare hand, I think the jury have a right to call that manslaughter if they please. A calls B a liar; B knifes him. Murder. B calls C a liar; C fells him with a blow, and kills him. Manslaughter. Oh, but throttling is worse than striking. Ay, worse in a man, but not in a woman, because women do not fight with the fist; they always go at each other with the claws, and no murder done one time in a thousand. If we are to judge women we really must not begin by being pig-headed idiots, and confounding them entirely, mind and limbs, with men. The truth is, language contains no word with which a man can strike a man to the heart, in his own person, as a woman can strike a woman with a word. It is at once stupid and cruel the way in which this poor creature's provocation has been slurred over. The evidence is all in favour of her continence. When out of place in Paris she fell in debt directly; a plain proof labour was her only way of getting bread. Here in lady feels if a cook walks up into the hall, that the cook feels if the mistress enters the castle to affront her. But a kitchen is a castle, and an arsenal of deadly weapons, with which the cook is familiar. The principal arms are—a rolling-pin, a steel to sharpen knives, a poker, a bread knife, carving knife, and a castle and arsenal of lethal weapons open on a Sunday forenoon, when even a little bit of peace and some little rest is possible, and gives an inconsiderate mistress there's no need for that; dinner is served, and she offends the mistress, and she threatens the spot. The cook says she will go and get her wages are paid her. "No," says the mistress, "you your time; but I will make you see the lacuna; but the climax was that the mistress, a hard-working woman, in her castle and kitchen, and dwelt upon the epithet. Then the cook, not one of the murderous weapons, sprang at her mistress's throat, and gave her such a blow that she broke the poor creature's jaw on the spot, and probably killed her on the spot, and may have said to the contrary. The deed is all amazement, vacillation, and uncertainty. Her deeds: She carries the ladder there; she puts a rope round its neck, and she passes the act off for suicide; she resolves on the means; she casts her eyes round the room with money in it; she breaks it open, and she does her purpose; she does not pillage; she flees; she robs in self-defence. Her deed is Paris this evening." Then a horror strikes her like a thunderclap. "No, I shall never see my parents." Is there nothing human in the poor savage awaking to her crime? "I am an American." So, then, she goes out intending to go and gets just where she did not mean to go, and gets there, and instantly pays a just debt no longer needed to save her life. In other words, more a real thief than a real murderer, of mankind understands the words. It is reflected by her subsequent conduct, still Diblanc slew Madame Riel wilfully and with malice aforethought. The evidence contradicts the malice and the aforethought, which are the very sting of the indictment, and the jury demur. "Oh, let that flea stick in the wall," says the judge, "we don't go by Johnson's Dictionary here; 'aforethought,' that means 'contemporaneous' in our vocabulary, and 'malice' means rage, passion, anything you like—except malice, of course. All you have got to do is to disregard the terms of the indictment, and if she killed the woman at all say she killed her with malice aforethought." The jury, who are generally novices and easily overcome by the picture of a gentleman thatched with horsehair, assent with reluctance, and recommend the prisoner to mercy, thereby giving their verdict the lie: for if the indictment was not an impudent falsehood and their verdict another she would be a most unfit subject for mercy. This bastard verdict which says "Yes" with a trumpet and "No" with a penny whistle being obtained by persuasion, the judge goes coolly back to Dr. Johnson, whom he has disowned for a time in order to get a verdict, and condemns the woman to death for having killed her fellow-creature with malice aforethought, as Johnson understands the words. But, as he too knows it is all humbug, and a verbal swindle invented by dead fools and forced upon him, he takes measures to refer it to a layman called the Home Secretary, who is to find straightforwardness, sense, manhood, and, above all, English for the whole lot.

Now, sir, I agree with the writer of your able article of the 15th of June, that the way out of this is to enlarge, purify, and correct the legal vocabulary. The judges are in a hole. With two words—"manslaughter" and "murder"—they are expected to do the work of three or four words; and how can they? It is impossible. Enlarge this vocabulary, and the most salutary consequences will flow in. Sweep away "manslaughter," which is an idiotic word meaning more than murder in etymology, and less in law, and divide unlawful killing into three heads—homicide, wilful homicide, murder. Then let it be enacted that henceforward it shall be lawful for juries to understand all words used in indictments, declarations, pleadings, &c., in their plain and grammatical sense, and to defy all other interpretations whatever. Twelve copies of every indictment ought to be in the jury box, and every syllable of those indictments proved whether bearing on fact

London it comes out that her wages were everything to her. She wanted to go, but could not for want of a little money. Why, her very strength, about which so much twaddle has been uttered, was not the strength of the individual, it was only the strength that comes to women of her age by an honourable, laborious, and continent life. And is it a small thing that to such a woman, working in her kitchen for her bread, another woman, whose life was not laborious and honourable like hers, should come and say, You are a prostitute. "Facile judicat qui pauca considerat." We must consider not the insult only, but the quarter whence it came; and we shall find the utmost limits of verbal provocation have been reached in Diblanc's case. The time—Sunday morning, when the world gets peace, and even cooks hope for it. The place—her own kitchen. The insult—the most intolerable the mind can conceive; and a lie. The result—honest labour and continence used none of the lethal weapons at hand, but took luxury and foul-mouthed slander by the throat. Luxury's arm was pithless against insulted labour and continence, and a crime was consummated, when between two working women there would only have been a fight.

It is the misfortune of women that few men, except one or two writers of fiction, can put themselves in a woman's place, and so qualify themselves to judge her in these obscure cases. But let me put a man, as nearly as I can, in this woman's place. A man is with his wife, whom he loves as dearly as Diblanc loves herself. Another man comes and calls that woman a prostitute to her face and his; there's a hatchet on one side of the husband, a carving knife on the other. The husband takes neither, but seizes the slanderer by the throat and squeezes the life out of him. Would that man be indicted for murder? I doubt it. Would Baron Channell ask a conviction for murder? I doubt it. If he did, no jury in England would convict. Yet here the provocation is purely verbal, and the killing identical with Diblanc's.

Let me now, without blaming any living person, draw the attention of public men to the stereotyped trickery and equivocation by means of which the death of Marguerite Diblanc has been compassed—in theory; for she is not to die, I conclude. Some lawyer, in the name of a humane Sovereign, draws a bloodthirsty, exaggerated indictment, and says

Diblanc slew Madame Riel wilfully and with malice aforethought. The evidence contradicts the malice and the aforethought, which are the very sting of the indictment, and the jury demur. "Oh, let that flea stick in the wall," says the judge, "we don't go by Johnson's Dictionary here; 'aforethought,' that means 'contemporaneous' in our vocabulary, and 'malice' means rage, passion, anything you like—except malice, of course. All you have got to do is to disregard the terms of the indictment, and if she killed the woman at all say she killed her with malice aforethought." The jury, who are generally novices and easily overcome by the picture of a gentleman thatched with horsehair, assent with reluctance, and recommend the prisoner to mercy, thereby giving their verdict the lie: for if the indictment was not an impudent falsehood and their verdict another she would be a most unfit subject for mercy. This bastard verdict which says "Yes" with a trumpet and "No" with a penny whistle being obtained by persuasion, the judge goes coolly back to Dr. Johnson, whom he has disowned for a time in order to get a verdict, and condemns the woman to death for having killed her fellow-creature with malice aforethought, as Johnson understands the words. or motive, or else the prisoner acquitted. Neither the Crown nor the private suitor should be allowed to exaggerate without smarting for it in the verdict, just as in the world overloaded invective recoils upon the shooter.

COLONEL BAKER'S SENTENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR,—A great many journals and weeklies have told the public that an English judge has passed too lenient a sentence on Colonel Baker because he belongs to the upper classes. Some have added that the same judge had inflicted a severe sentence on certain gas stokers, and so we have a partial judge upon the bench. This is a grave conclusion, and, if true, would be deplorable. You would yourself regret it, and therefore will, I am sure, permit me to show you, by hard facts, that all this is not only untrue, but the exact opposite of the truth in every particular. Fact 1. The proceedings against Baker commenced with an application for delay and a special jury. Here was an opportunity to favour him. The judge rejected the application, and he was tried by a common jury. 2. On the trial the prosecuting counsel attacked him with a severity that is now unusual, and used a false comparison to lead the jury farther than the evidence warranted. 3. In contrast to this, Baker was defended with strict moderation. In France the accused speaks as well as his counsel, but in England his own mouth is closed, and we must assume instructions and give him the credit or discredit due to his line of defence. Now, there was a point in the plaintiff's evidence which to my mind is womanly and charming, but still, before a common jury, Mr. Hawkins could have done almost what he liked with it. It appeared that when the young lady was on the doorstep she told her assailant he must hold her or she would fall. They little know the power of counsel who doubt that, by a series of sly ironical questions on this point, the case could have been weakened by ridicule, and the plaintiff tortured. Since the lower orders have been dragged into this, it should be considered that every one of them would have so defended himself, except those who had got rid of the case before by shoving the girl off the step instead of holding her. "That is the sort of men they are." My brilliant contemporaries know nothing about them. How should they, being in an exalted sphere? 4. The common jury cleared him of a criminal assault, and found him guilty of an indecent assault. My brilliant contemporaries hanker after the higher issue, and would like to see it in the judgment, though it was not in the verdict. But that would be to juggle with the constitutional tribunal, and be inexcusable in a judge. 5. Mr. Justice Brett dwelt on the enormity of the offence, and admitted only one palliating circumstance—viz., that the culprit, when he found the lady would risk her life sooner than be insulted, came to his senses, and showed a tardy compunction. This was so; and Colonel Baker's line of defence before the magistrates and before the court entitled him to this small palliation. 6. Witnesses were called to character, with a view to mitigating punishment. Now, when a culprit of the lower orders can do this effectually, it always reduces punishment—sometimes one half, or more. Were it to go for nothing where a gentleman has committed his first public crime, there would be gross partiality in favour of the lower orders, and an utter defiance of precedent. 7. The punishment inflicted was a fine, £500, and a year's imprisonment as a first-class misdemeanant. My brilliant contemporaries think that a poor man would have been much worse punished. Now let us understand one another. Do they mean a poor man who had so assaulted a lady, or a poor man who had so assaulted a poor woman? Their language only fits the latter view. Very well, then. My brilliant contemporaries have eaten the insane root that takes the reason prisoner. Every day in the year men of the lower orders commit two thousand such assaults upon women of the lower orders, and it is so little thought of that the culprits are rarely brought to justice at all. When they are, it is a police magistrate, and not a jury, the women apply to. It is dealt with on the spot by a small fine or a very short imprisonment. Colonel Baker, had he been a navvy, would have got one month. My brilliant contemporaries go to their imagination for their facts. I, poor drudge, go to one out of twenty folio notebooks in which I have entered, alphabetically, the curious facts of the day for many a year. The fines for indecent assaults range from five pounds to twenty. Amongst the examples is one that goes far beyond Baker's case, for the culprit had recourse to chloroform. I call this a criminal assault. The magistrate, however, had a doubt, and admitted the culprit to bail. At the expiration of the bail the Lucretia in humble life walked into the court on Tarquin's arm, and begged to withdraw the plaint. She had married him in that brief interval. And that, O too imaginative contemporaries, "is the sort of women they are." The magistrate scolded them both, and said it was collusion to defeat the law. He lacked humour, poor man. When a lady or a gentleman is one of the parties, that immediately elevates the offence. I have a case in my list that resembles Baker's in some respects. It was a railway case—the offender a gentleman, the plaintiff a respectable milliner. This was dealt with at quarter sessions; fine £200, no imprisonment. In Craft's case the parties were reversed. Craft, a carpenter, at Farringdon, kissed by force the daughter of a neighbouring clergyman. She took him before a jury, and he got six months. But her Majesty remitted three months of this sentence.

I am informed there was a case the other day, and a bad one—punishment two months. But I will not be sure, for I have not seen it. Of this I am absolutely sure, that Baker's sentence is severe beyond all precedent. His fine is more than double the highest previous fine. His imprisonment, if not shortened, will be four times the term of Craft's, and about twelve times what, if the female had been in humble life, a blackguard by descent and inheritance would have got, and he is both fined and imprisoned. I think it most proper a gentleman should be more severely punished for so heinous an offence. But it is not proper that facts should be turned clean topsy-turvy, and the public humbugged into believing that the lower order of people are treated more severely in such cases, when, on the contrary, they are treated with gross partiality; still less is it proper that these prodigious errors of fact should be used to cast a slur upon the just reputation of a very sagacious, careful, and independent judge. To drag the gas stokers' case into this question is monstrous. Law has many branches, and a somewhat arbitrary scale of punishments that binds the judges more or less. As a rule it treats offences against the person more lightly than offences against property—ay, even when marks of injury have been left upon the person for months. Now, the law of England abhors conspiracy, and Mr. Justice Brett found the law; he did not make it, nor yet did his grandfather. The gas stokers' sentence had nothing on earth to do with their birth and parentage. They were representative men—the ringleaders of a great conspiracy, and the only offenders nailed in a case where our gaols ought to have been filled with the blackguards. It was a heartless, egotistical, and brutal conspiracy; its object a fraud, and its instrument a public calamity. The associated egotists inflicted darkness on a great city during the hours of traffic. They not only incommoded a vast public cruelly; they also added to the perils of the city, and most likely injured life and limb. The judge who punished these deliberate and combined criminals severely was the mouth-piece of an offended and injured public, and not of any clique whatever; for no clique monopolises light nor can do without it, least of all the poor. He gave his reasons at the time, and the press approved them, as anybody can see by turning to the files. To these facts, sir, I beg to add a grain of common sense. What is there in a British Colonel to dazzle a British judge? The judge is a much greater man in society and in the country; and in court he is above the Princes of the Blood, for he represents the person and wields the power of the Sovereign. Class distinctions do not much affect the judges of our day. They sit too high above all classes. One or two of them, I see, share the universal foible, and truckle a little to the press. If a modern judge is above that universal weakness, he is above everything but his conscience and his God. Perhaps my brilliant contemporaries have observed that solitary foible in our judges, and are resolved that Mr. Justice Brett shall not overrate their ability to gauge his intellects or his character. If that was their object, they have written well.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I claim the right of a good citizen to disown, before God and man, a wicked and insane act just committed in the name of the country, and therefore in mine, unless I publicly dissent.

An Englishman named Murdock was killed yesterday at Lewes by the ministers of the law, for a crime the law of England does not visit with death. The crime was manslaughter. It is not possible that even an English judge could so mistake the law as really to take the man's crime for murder. It was destitute, not of one, two, or three, but of all the features that the law requires in murder. On the other hand, it had all the features that distinguish manslaughter. There was no murderous weapon—there was no weapon at all; no premeditation, no personal malice. The act was done in the confusion, hurry, and agitation of a struggle, and that struggle was commenced, not by the homicide but the victim.

As respects the animus at the time, it is clear the violence was done alio intuitu; the prisoner was fighting, not to kill but to escape; and that he never from first to last aimed at killing appeared further by his remaining in the neighbourhood, and his surprise and ignorance of his victim's death. In a word, it was manslaughter in its mildest form. I have seen a boy of eighteen hanged for stealing a horse. It was a barbarous act, but it was the law. I have seen a forger hanged. It was cruel, but it was the law. But now, for the first time (while murderers are constantly escaping the law), I hav seen an English head fall by the executioner in defiance of the law. I wash this man's blood from my hands, and from my honourable name. I disown that illegal act, and the public will follow me. I cannot say to-day where the blame lies, and in what proportions ; but I will certainly find out ; and as certainly all those concerned in it populo respondebunt et mihi.

STARVATION REFUSING PLENTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR,—The journals recorded last week the death by starvation of a respectable sempstress. Now, the death by starvation of a single young working woman is a blot upon civilisation and a disgrace to humanity. It implies also great misery and much demi-starvation in the class that furnishes the extreme example. The details in this case were pitiable, and there were some comments in the Daily Telegraph well adapted to make men feel and think even if they never knew hunger personally. They have set me thinking for one, and I beg to offer my thoughts. I have observed, in a general way, that the world is full of live counterparts, by which I mean people that stand in need of other people, who stand equally in need of them; only these two live counterparts of the social system cannot find each other out. Distance and ignorance keep them apart. Of late the advertisement sheet has done much to cure that, and is an incalculable boon to mankind. But as there are counterpart individuals, so there are counterpart classes, and I shall ask your assistance to bring two of these classes together and substitute for starvation repletion. I see before me, say, two thousand honest, virtuous, industrious young women, working hard and half starved; and I see before me at least twenty thousand other women holding out plenty in both hands, and that plenty rejected with scorn by young women of very little merit, or, if not rejected, accepted only under vexatious and galling conditions imposed by the persons to be benefited. Aid me then, Sir, to introduce to a starving class an oppressed and insulted and pillaged class which offers a clean healthy lodging and no rent to pay, butcher's meat twice a day, food at all hours, tea, beer, and from £12 to £18 a year pocket-money, in return for a few hours of healthy service per day. To speak more plainly, domestic servants have become rare, owing to wholesale and most injudicious exportation; and although their incapacity in their business has greatly increased—especially the incapacity of cooks—they impose not only higher wages, but intolerable conditions. The way the modest householder is ground down by these young ladies is a grievance too large to be dealt with under this head, and will probably lead to a masters and mistresses' league. Suffice it here to say that full forty thousand domestic servants are now engaged yearly in London on written characters, and thirty thousand without a character; and I speak within bounds when I say that there are good places by the dozen open to any respectable sempstress. There are mistresses by the thousand who, in the present dearth of good and civil servants, would try a respectable novice. A respectable sempstress has always half a character, for she is trusted with materials and does not steal them; and the oppressed mistresses in question would forgive a few faults in housework at first starting in a woman who could compensate them by skill with the needle—no mean addition to a servant's value. I now turn to the sempstresses. Why do they sit hungry to the dullest of all labour, and hold aloof from domestic service, at a time when ladies born are beginning to recognise how much better off is the rich housemaid than the poor lady? I suspect the sempstresses are deluded by two words, "liberty" and "wages." They think a female servant has no liberty, and that her principal remuneration is her "wages."

I address myself to these two errors. Οὐκ ἔστιν ὅστις, ἴσ' ἀνὴρ ἐλεύθερος. Our liberty is restrained by other means than bolts and bars. It is true that a female servant cannot run into the streets whenever she likes. But she sometimes goes on errands and takes her time. She slips out eternally, and gets out one evening at least every week. Then, as to wages, the very word is a delusion as far as she is concerned. Her wages are a drop in the ocean of her remuneration. She comes out of a single room, where she pigs with her relations, and she receives as remuneration for her services a nice clean room all to herself, the market price of which, and the actual cost to her employer, is at least 6s. per week, and the use of a kitchen, and in some cases of a servants' hall, which is worth

2s. per week, and the run of other bright and healthy rooms. In the crib where she pigged with her relations, she often had a bit of bacon for dinner, and a red herring for supper. In the palace of cleanliness and comfort she is promoted to, she gets at least four meals a day, and butcher's meat at two of them. This, at the present price of provisions, is 16s. per week, which is more than an agricultural labourer in the Southern counties receives wherewith to keep a wife and seven children. But, besides this, she gets a shilling a week for beer, and from a shilling to eighteenpence for washing. Besides all this she has from twelve to eighteen pounds in hard cash, with occasional presents of money and dress. The wages of her class have been raised when they ought to have been lowered. The mechanic's wages are justly raised, because the value of money depends upon the value of the necessities of life. These have risen, and therefore money has sunk. But that rise does not affect the female servants, and it does affect those who feed them like fighting cocks. A droller piece of logic than the rise of fed servants' pocket-money because unfed servants' wages are raised, I never encountered even in Anglo-Saxony. However, the upshot is that any half-starved sempstress who will read this crude letter of mine, and make diligent inquiries, will find that I am right in the main; that domestic servants are trampling too hard upon the people who are called their masters and mistresses; and that three thousand homes are open to a young woman who can prove that she is not a thief, and six thousand hands are offering not only plenty, but repletion, and liberal pocket-money to boot. The pay of a housemaid, in rent, fire, food, washing, beer, and pocket-money, is about £70 a year, and this hungry sempstresses can obtain if they will set about it, and without any loss of dignity: for, as a rule, servants nowadays hold their heads as high or a little higher than their mistresses do.

I am, Sir,

Your faithful servant,

CHARLES READE.

OUTRAGES ON THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR, —I am one of the many persons who are moved by your denunciation of the lawless cruelties perpetrated on the Jews in Russia, and the apparent connivance or apathy of the varnished savages who misgovern those barbarians. If the latter persist in that course and so make that a national crime which might otherwise remain the crime of numerous individuals, some great calamity will fall on them, or history is a blind guide; and by the same rule you give friendly advice when you urge our Government and people to protest and wash their hands before God and man of this terrible crime. I fear, however, that a mere Government protest will be slighted or evaded by Russian mendacity. Fortunately our nation can speak and act by other organs besides our Government, and now is the time to show ourselves men, and men whose hearts are horrified at the cowardly cruelty of this Tartar tribe to God's ancient people.

Let us take a wide view of this situation, since it is so great and so new in our day; for wholesale persecution of the Jews is not of this epoch, but "a reversion" to the dark ages. One of the signs that distinguish a true Christian from a sham one is that the former studies the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures with care and reverence, and there learns the debt his heart, soul, and understanding owe to historians, poets, philosophers, prophets, preachers, and teachers, some writing Greek, some Hebrew, but every one of them Jews; and also learns to pity and respect the Jewish nation, though under a cloud, and to hope for the time when they will resume their ancient territory, which is so evidently kept waiting for them. This, the hope of every Christian, is the burning and longing desire of many, for another reason—because the prophecies we receive, though obscure in matters of detail, are clear as day on two points: That the Jews are to repossess Palestine, and, indeed, to rule from Lebanon to Euphrates; and that this event is to be the first of a great series of changes, leading to a vast improvement in the condition of poor suffering mankind and of creation in general. Now we have here in prospect a glorious event as sure as that the sun will rise to-morrow. The only difference is that the sun will rise at a certain hour, and the Jews will occupy Syria and resume their national glory at an uncertain day.

No doubt it is the foible of mankind to assume that an uncertain date must be a distant one. But that is unreasonable. Surely it is the duty of wise and sober men not to run before the Almighty in this thing; but, on the other hand, to watch precursory signs and lend our humble co-operation, should so great a privilege be accorded to us. This sudden persecution of the Jews in the very nation where they are most numerous—may it not be a precursory sign and a reminder from Providence that their abiding city is not in European Tartary? I almost think some such reminder was needed; for when I was a boy the pious Jews still longed for the Holy Land. They prayed, like Daniel, with their windows open towards Jerusalem. Yet, now that the broken and impoverished Saracen would cede them territory at one-tenth of its agricultural and commercial value, a cold indifference seems to have come over them. I often wonder at this change of sentiment about so great a matter and in so short a period, comparatively speaking, and puzzle myself as to the reason. Two solutions occur to me: 1. Dispersed in various nations, whose average inhabitants are inferior in intelligence and forethought to themselves, they thrive as individual aliens more than they may think so great a multitude of Jews could thrive in a land of their own, where blockheads would be scarce. 2. They have for centuries contracted their abilities to a limited number of peaceful arts and trades; they may distrust their power to diversify their abilities, and be suddenly a complete nation, with soldiers, sailors, merchants, husbandmen, as well as financiers and artists.

If I should happen to be anywhere near the mark in these suggestions, let me offer a word in reply to both objections. In the first place, they both prove too much, for they would keep the Jews dispersed for ever. It is certain, therefore, they will have to be got over some day, and therefore the sooner the better. As to objection one, it is now proved that sojourning among inferior nations has more drawbacks than living at home. True, the Russian yokel has for years been selling to the Jews his summer labour in winter, and at a heavy discount. But the silly, improvident brute has turned like a wild beast upon them, and, outwitted lawfully, has massacred them contrary to law: and truly Solomon had warned them there is no animal more dangerous than a fool and a brute beast without understanding. Besides, they need not evacuate other countries in a hurry and before the resources of their own land are developed. Dimidium facti qui bene capit, habet. Palestine can be colonised effectually from Russia alone, where there are 3,000,000 Jews trembling for life and property; and the rest would follow. As to the second objection, History is a looking-glass at our backs. Turn round and look into it with your head as well as your eyes, and you shall see the future. Whatever Jews have done Jews may do. They are a people of genius, and genius is not confined by Nature, but by will, by habit, or by accident. To omit to try is not to fail. What have this people tried heartily and failed in? Warriors, writers, builders, merchants, law-givers, husbandmen, and supreme in all!

When they will consent to rise to their destiny I know not, but this I do know, that, whenever they do, not excessive calculations, but some faith, will be expected from them, as it always has been, as a condition of their triumphs, and they will prove equal to the occasion, and be great in the arts of peace and war, and their enemies melt away before them like snow off a dyke. Should they seem to require help, at starting, from any other nation, blessed will be the nation that proffers it; and the nation that persecutes them will be made an example of in some way or other. Therefore, if by any chance this recent outrage should decide the Jewish leaders to colonise Palestine from Russia, let us freely offer ships, seamen, money—whatever we are asked for. It will be a better national investment than Egyptian, Brazilian, or Peruvian bonds. Meantime, I implore our divines to separate themselves, and all the souls under their charge, in all the churches and chapels of the land, from the crime of those picture-worshipping idolaters and cowardly murderers, by public disavowal and prayerful humiliation, since the monsters call themselves Christians.

Yours faithfully,

PRIVATE BILLS AND PUBLIC WRONGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR,—Not being a Member of Parliament, I must either submit in silence to a bitter wrong, or avert it by publicity. The matter is national. Other grave interests are at stake besides my own, and unless the House of Commons is warned in time it may be ensnared into an act it would look back upon with some dismay. I suppose if anybody were to propose in a private bill to do away with the House of Lords, or repeal the whole common law, people would see that the promoter could not be allowed to enjoy the unfair advantages of a private bill in such discussion. Yet there is a private bill which aims at high game; for it proposes to unsettle the property of the nation, and make it all insecure and liable to surprises and night attacks in Parliament. There is a bill called "Albert Terrace Improvement," which proposes to rob a substantial freeholder of property which I am justified in valuing at £120,000, and several substantial leaseholders who have laid out from £850 to £4,600 a-piece, and most of them over £2,000, by the odious and oppressive measure of compulsory purchase. For certain reasons, which I will explain should it ever be necessary, the freeholder would never get under that system one-third of the value. The leaseholders' case is come. They could not get their real value, and they live in the houses, and no money could compensate them, because no money could enable them to get houses like these, with gardens running to the wall of Hyde Park. Such properties are relics of the past.

The bill proposes to give these houses, gardens, and sites—not to the public as Northumberland House was given, nor yet by voluntary purchase—but to a single individual, who wants them for a building speculation. The operation commenced thus : We the leaseholders received visits, not from road-makers, nor Peers of the realm, but from architects and builders. These showed us plans of enormous houses with a turret, and sounded us as to our willingness to turn out of our sweet rus in urbe—the only one left in the hideous monotony of masonry. We objected, as we have done to similar attempts before now.

Presently out comes the bill, and lo ! our architects and builders have melted away before the eye of Parliament, and no projector figures in the bill, but a road-maker and patriot Peer. This public benefactor wants to make a new road into the park and dedicate it to the public. That he distinctly advances as his main object. But he insinuates that he cannot do this act of patriotism without taking seven of his neighbours' houses, and perhaps more. To carry out this object, a gentleman of good descent, who, nevertheless, is in the House of Lords only an obscure Baron, is at this moment in the Commons Emperor Elect of Knightsbridge, for he asks from that House powers so unconstitutional and ill-defined, as he knows from history the Commons would not concede to his Sovereign.

The Queen has a park ; he proposes to break into it. The State has its road-makers ; he is for kicking them out of their business. The nation values almost beyond everything else upon God's earth the equal security of property in the hands of Lords and Commons. He proposes to trample on the nation's feeling, and on those equal rights by the odious measure of compulsory purchase. To be sure he puts forward what he calls a public object, viz., a new public road into the park. Now, I am not going to argue the whole case, but merely to give Parliament the means of arguing it soundly.

1. His public road is not a public road, but a new private carriage drive, down which the public would not be allowed to run a wheel ; and so great a preference is already shown for private carriages in the park and its entrances, that to open a new drive, and not a road, to traverse the park, would offend the public and rouse unpleasant discussions.

2. This "oligarch's alley," miscalled in the bill a public road, is to be 44 feet wide. The property it demands in the bill is 156 feet wide.

3. The undertaker or his associates, or both, are possessed, in some way, of property lying between Sloane Street and Hyde Park ; for they are taking down the houses. He solicits in the bill the right to deviate. He can deviate into rectitude and buy land ; he need not deviate into built houses and misappropriation.

There are many other public objections to his "oligarch's alley," which he calls a public road. But those I leave to the House of Commons ; and I leave to that House with perfect confidence the Albert Terrace Spoliation Bill, divested of its plausible pretext. I will not be so unjust to the Commons and their history as to let your million readers suppose that House needs to be exhorted by me when private cupidity stands nude on one side and the constitutional rights of Englishmen on the other.

But what may not be done in the dark ? When private bills come on there is nobody in the House but the personal friends of the projectors. A job of this kind glides from a bill into an Act in less time than it would take to hatch a serpent, and the House becomes the cat's-paw of a tyranny quite foreign to its own heart and principles.

This is where the shoe really pinches. Only a few members have time or inclination to attend to these cursed little private bills, especially when they are up to the neck in the Hellespont—and who can blame them?—and so a very little varnish carries them through. John Milton says truly that even wisdom has its blind side. The times are high-minded, and the high-minded are unsuspecting ; and so, "At Wisdom's gate Suspicion sleeps, and thinks no ill where no ill seems."

This letter, then, is written partly to warn the nation that its rights are at stake, but still more to warn our historical champions of these rights. I submit that, without a prima facie case, it is not fair that worthy, well-affected citizens, all paying taxes to the State, should be juggled in a private bill out of the unremitting protection of the State. It is even hard, and very hard, we should be put to the suspense, anxiety, and expense of fighting such a bill in committee. At present, however, all I ask for is numbers. Oh ! do, pray, give the nation and us, on Thursday afternoon, not a handful, but a House ; and let the nation know from high-minded Tories and high-minded Liberals whether it has lost the love of both, and lost the greatest protector of its sacred rights it has ever had.

NABOTH'S VINEYARD

February 5th,

"A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY GLOBE," TORONTO.

SIR,—Three columns of your journal have been sent me, headed "A Terrible Temptation," yet mainly devoted to reviving stale misrepresentations of my older works. The writer even goes beyond my original detractors—most of them now my converts—for he slanders the character and sincerity of the author; and that in terms so defamatory, and so evidently malicious, that I could sue him, or even indict him, if he was worth it. But I know by experience what would follow: an anonymous slanderer is always a coward; he would run away and hide the moment he saw the dog-whip of the law coming, and I should have to punish some unguarded editor, publisher, or printer, less criminal than the real culprit, but more of a man. I prefer, therefore, to deal with the slanderer as I may; only I expect you, who have published the poison, to publish the antidote.

The anonymous slanderer, in his rifle-pit, has so many unfair advantages over the more manly author, that it is impossible to expose him without first naming and ticketing his habitual blunders and frauds. This necessity compelled me long ago to invent a new science. I call it

LITERARY ZOOLOGY.

Of that science certain terms are indispensable in this discussion: unfortunately they are new to the Canadian public, so I must explain them.

THE CRITICASTER,

first pinned on cork by me in 1859. A very curious little animal, with singular traits; the most distinctive is, that in literary questions easily soluble by direct evidence he flies to cant, conjecture, or "the depths of his inner consciousness," and that means "the shallows of his ignorance." He is a mediæval reasoner, who has lived over into the nineteenth century by some miracle, but no more belongs to it than the Patagonian does, with his implements of stone. This little creature's mind and method are the exact opposite of the lawyer's, the naturalist's, and the critic's.

THE PEURIENT PRUDE.

(First introduced by me to the American public in 1864.)

This is a lewd hypocrite, who passes over all that is sweet, and pure, and innocent in a book, with genuine disrelish, and fixes greedily on whatever a foul mind can misinterpret or exaggerate into indecency. He makes arbitrary additions to the author's meaning, and so ekes out the indelicacy to suit his own true taste, which is for the indelicate; this done, he turns round upon the author, whom he has defiled, and says, "You are unclean." And so the poor author is. But why? A lump of human dirt has been sitting on him, and discolouring him.

THE SHAM-SAMPLE-SWINDLER.

This is a kind of vermin that works thus. He finds an objectionable passage or two in a good book, or a borrowed idea or two in an original book. He quotes these exceptional flaws, and then adds silyly, "And this is the character of all the rest." Here a little bit of truth is made the cover to an enormous lie: but, unfortunately for the public, the bit of truth is compact and visible, the huge lie is in the dark. There is no cure to the sham-sample-swindler except reading the whole book; but the sham sample deters its reader from reading the book. Here, therefore, we have an impregnable circle of fraud. The sham-sample-swindle, as applied to grain, is seldom tried by farmers; their morals are not the morals of scribblers: God forbid they ever should be! It was once tried in Reading market, when I was a boy; but the swindler was flogged out of the market, and never dared show his face there again while he lived. Not so with his literary brethren; they are never flogged, never hung, never nailed on barn-doors. Rarely detected, never effectually exposed, they pursue, without a blush, or a single throb of conscience, the easiest, surest, neatest, and meanest swindle in creation.

THE TRUE ANONYMUNCULE.

This little creature must not be confounded with the anonymous writers, who supply narratives of current events, and discuss public measures with freedom, but deal largely in generalities, and very little in personalities. Those are the working bees that gather honey for the public. Reade's anonymuncule is no great producer, he can do little but sting. He is of two kinds—the anonymous letter-writer, pest of families; and the anonymous literary detractor, pest of the fine arts. Both varieties have this essential trait in common, they abuse the shelter and the obscurity of the anonymous. The literary anonymuncule often abuses it doubly: he belies his superior in one organ of criticism, then flies to another, and says the same thing in other words. Then the duped public believes that two disinterested judges have condemned its favourite; whereas the poor editors are only a couple of unguarded puppets, pulled by one unscrupulous anonymuncule raging with literary envy.

I make no apology for this preface, because it is of general utility; all, who study it with a little care, can apply it to a thousand cases—past, present, and to come—in which I have no personal interest.

Now to the ephemeral application of these immortal truths. I am a popular author, bearing an indifferent character for temper and moderation, where injustice is done to others, or even to myself, but a high character for sincerity and humanity. As to my literary fame, it has been acquired fairly, as my very enemies admit: the Press has never been favourable to me, nor even just; the one incorruptible judge of authors has used its own judgment, and gradually accorded me its esteem, I might say its reverence. Now comes an anonymuncule and undertakes to prove that I am an immoral writer, an indecent writer, a writer by the foot and the month, a writer on a false system, the opposite of Scott's and Shakspeare's, and all great masters; and, above all, a social firebrand, and a public criminal. This latter phrase the anonymuncule thinks so appropriate, so decent, and so humane, that he repeats it with evident gusto and self-satisfaction. Now you are aware that no man of honour ever brings such charges against a gentleman of high repute, without some slight show of decent regret, and that none but a low-born villain equivocates, exaggerates, or tampers in any way with facts advanced to support a charge of public crime. Bear that indisputable position in mind, while I dissect my anonymuncule.

He opens his libel by saying that I have shocked public morality; and the following are his main proofs:

A.—I have made a brilliant adventuress of the Demimonde the most interesting female character, if not technically the heroine.

B.—I have thrown her vulgarity into the background.

C.—I have thrown her uncleanness into the background, and praised her by faint blame, etc., etc.

Answer to B. It is a direct falsehood. How does this writer know that Rhoda Somerset was vulgar? He knows it only from me. My fearless honesty has put an oath into the woman's mouth, and plenty of Billingsgate beside. Lie 1.

C.—Behold the "prurient prude." This word "unclean-ness," applied to vice, is one of his sure signs. Illicit connections are vicious, but they are no more unclean than matrimonial connections. To apply a term which is nasty, without being strictly appropriate, betrays to a philosopher's eye the prurient prude. Whenever in a newspaper you see the word "filth" applied to adultery or other frailty, the writer is a lewd hypocrite, a prurient prude. Remember that: it is well worth remembering. Divested of that false and repulsive expression, what does this charge come to? That I have but coldly stated the illicit connection between Rhoda Somerset and Sir Charles Bassett; I have gratified this prurient prude's real taste with no amorous scenes, no pictures of frailty in action. This is quite true. I have given the virtuous loves of Sir Charles and Bella Bruce in full detail, to gain my reader's sympathy with virtue: and the vicious connection I have coldly stated, like a chronicler. Mino is an art that preaches by pictures. I draw the illicit love, with decent reserve; I paint the virtuous love in the purest and sweetest colours I can command. Who but a prurient prude, with no relish for my scenes of virtuous love, would distort this to my discredit?

What writer has ever produced scenes purer and sweeter than the innocent loves of Ruperta and Compton Bassett in this book? Yet how have the prurient prudes, one and all,

a bore. Poor shallow hypocrites! These women in snow are inconvenient: they do not follow and sustain fellow groping the soil for the thing he has lost.
Is daylight breaking yet?

A.—This is a divine falsehood. It is the same made Lady Bassett by the same hand. Were Rhoda Somerset the only one who remains, and the story is next place, Rhoda Somerset is the book, as this the book, as this woman—then a perfect woman character I admit her to be the actual book. Even Raperta Somerset is a mere impenitent. Let any her penitence connects her with the world. The the woman who is the world. The world who has stood the test of the world. The world contemporary literature. The world who is the Mary Magdalene is the world. The world who is always a horror. The world who is the world.

And what is my task? I am the world. The world dict that contemporary literature is the world.

If fifteen years ago I had been summing up Rhoda Somerset, I should have nothing caught her penitence. The world

Answer to B. It is a direct falsehood. How does this writer know that Rhoda Somerset was vulgar? He knows it only from me. My fearless honesty has put an oath into the woman's mouth, and plenty of Billingsgate beside. Lie 1.

O.—Behold the "prurient prude." This word "uncleanness," applied to vice, is one of his sure signs. Illicit connections are vicious, but they are no more unclean than matrimonial connections. To apply a term which is nasty, without being strictly appropriate, betrays to a philosopher's eye the prurient prude. Whenever in a newspaper you see the word "filth" applied to adultery or other frailty, the writer is a lewd hypocrite, a prurient prude. Remember that: it is well worth remembering. received them? With marked distaste; they call the scenes a bore. Poor shallow hypocrites! These scenes of virgin snow are inconvenient: they do but fidget and obstruct a dirty fellow groping the soil for the thing he denounces and loves.

Is daylight breaking in?

A.—This is a double falsehood. In the first place, I have made Lady Bassett by far the most interesting character. Were Rhoda Somerset cut out, the deeper interest would still remain, and the story be still rather a strong story. In the next place, Rhoda Somerset is not one character all through the book, as this anonymuncle infers. She is first a frail woman—then a penitent woman. Now it is only in the latter character I admit her to the second place of interest. Even Ruperta Bassett is more interesting than Somerset impenitent. Let any lover of truth study the book, and he will find that no sympathy is conceded to Somerset until her penitence commences, and that the sympathy enlarges as the woman gets better and better. Yet here is an anonymuncle who utterly ignores a woman's penitence in summing up her character. Is there one precedent for this reasoning, that has stood the test of time and reason? No doubt some contemporary females and contemporary criticasters reviled Mary Magdalene to her dying day, and said, "Once a harlot, always a harlot." But what has been the verdict of posterity? And what, in any case, is the verdict of posterity, but the verdict that contemporaries might, and ought to, have arrived at?

If fifteen years' penitence are to go for nothing, in summing up Rhoda Somerset, for how much less than nothing ought ten minutes' penitence to count for in that thief, whom, nevertheless, a venerable Church has summed up a saint?

John Bunyan was a blaspheming blackguard. He repented, and wrote a novel that has done more good to men's souls than most sermons. Would this anonymuncle sum him up a blaspheming blackguard?

Kotzebue's Mrs. Haller is an adulteress less excusable than Rhoda Somerset, a low girl with mercenary parents. Do Mrs. Haller's years of penitence go for nothing? Or does Kotzebue being dead, and Reade being alive, make the penitent adulteress a penitent, and the penitent Anonyma an unmitigated Anonyma? Yet, divest the argument of this idiotic blunder, and that part of the libel falls to earth.

D.—He says I have made Sir Charles Bassett the model man of the book. This is untrue. I have not pretended that he was ever much worse than many other young men of fortune; but I have openly disapproved his early life—have represented him as heartily regretting it, so soon as the virtuous love dawned on him; and yet I have shown some consequences of his early frailties following him for years. If this is not fiction teaching morality in its own unobtrusive way—what is?

E.—He says that there is a strain of the Somerset through the whole book, and that a nurse giving suck is described more sexually than it ought to be. This is a deliberate falsehood. That great maternal act is described, not sensually, but poetically; and attention is fixed, not on that which the prurient prude was itching for, but on the exquisite expression of the maternal face while nursing—a poetical beauty the sculptors, Chantrey and all, have missed, to their discredit as artists.

F.—He says Lady Bassett was on the brink of adultery. This is another deliberate falsehood. Mr. Angelo may have been in danger; but it takes two to commit adultery; and it is clear the woman was never in danger for a moment.

The anonymuncle then proceeds to say that I have given a true picture; that in England the “kept mistress” has become an institution; that Anonyma did beckon our Countesses and Duchesses across the park, and they followed her, &c.: in short, he delivers a complete defence of the man he has just slandered; for vices are like diseases—to cure them you must ventilate them. Well, I have ventilated the English concubine in my way, and my anonymuncle has slandered me, and imitated me, in the same column of the same newspaper. Having detected himself in this latter act, he catches a faint glimpse of his own conduct, drops the slanderer, and announces that he is going to discourse artistically. Well, when he gets out of slander he is like a fish out of water; I wander through a waste of syllables, hunting, fishing, and diving for an idea; and at last I detect the head of an idea in one paragraph, and the tail in another—these scribblers never can articulate their topics—and I drag its disjuncta membra together “with oxen and wainropes,” and so get to this—

Whatever a publisher publishes from week to week, the author must have so composed: ergo, Mr. Reade writes so many feet per week, and that makes him a crude accumulator of nothings. Now, where did he get his major premiss? From the depths of his inner consciousness. If he knew anything about authors, as distinct from scribblers and anonymuncula, he would be aware that we never write, as they do, from hand to mouth. Between the publication of my last novel and the issue of the first weekly number of the tale, eleven months elapsed. The depths of this man's inner consciousness inform him that I did not write one line of the story in those eleven months. Well, they tell him a lie, for I wrote it all—except a few chapters—in those eleven months; and it was all written, copied, and corrected before the Canadian public saw the first line of it.

He now carries the same system, the criticaster's, into a matter of more general importance. He says that I found my fictions on fact, and so tell lies; and that the chiefs of Fiction did not found fictions on fact and so told only truths.

Now, where does he discover that the chiefs of Fiction did not found their figments upon facts? Where?—why, in that little asylum of idiots, the depths of his inner consciousness! It could be proved in a court of law that Shakspeare founded his fictions on fact, wherever he could get hold of fact. Fact is that writer's idol. It was his misfortune to live in an age when the supplies of fact were miserably meagre. Could he be resuscitated, and a copy of the Toronto Globe handed him at the edge of the grave, he would fall on his knees, and thank God for that marvel, a newspaper, and for the rich vein of ore, whose value to the theatre he would soon show us, to our utter amazement. Living in that barren age, he did his best. He ransacked Belleforest, Baker, Hollinshed, for facts. He transplanted whole passages from the latter bodily into "Macbeth," and from Plutarch into his "Coriolanus." His historical dramas are crammed with facts, or legends he believed to be fact. Wolsey's speech interwoven with his own—Fact; Henry the Eighth's interjections—Fact; the names of Pistol, Bardolph, and a dozen more—Fact: you may see them on the Court-rolls of Stratford-on-Avon any day you like. His Dogberry and Verges—Fact—from Cricklade in Gloucestershire; his charnelhouse in "Romeo and Juliet"—Fact—from Stratford-on-Avon, etc., etc. This anonymuncule can put some limits to his ignorance in twenty-four hours, by reading the "Prolegomena" to Malone's edition, and a few of the notes. Shakspeare habitually interweaves fact with fiction; so this anonymuncule has called him a liar! As for Scott, he is one mass of facts. I know this from various sources—my own mediæval researches, Scott's biography, and Scott's own notes to his own works. He was forty years collecting facts before he wrote a novel. Pure imagination is most ardent in youth; why then did he not pass his youth in writing? He would, if he had held this anonymuncule's theory. He employed that imaginative period in collecting facts: he raked the Vale of Ettrick for facts: he ransacked the Advocates' Library for facts; and so far from disguising his method, he has revealed it fully in his notes. His ability is his own, but his plan, though not his genius, is mine. Now I will substitute the method of the critic for the method of the criticaster, and sift this question in the person of a single artist. Daniel Defoe wrote a narrative on the plan this anonymuncule praises, and says it never leads to lying; it is called "The Apparition of Mrs. Veal." He also wrote a narrative on the method I have adopted, called "Robinson Crusoe." Now, the private history of the latter composition is truly instructive. Daniel Defoe came to his work armed with facts from three main sources: 1. Facts derived in conversation from Selkirk, or Selcraig, who spent some months in London on his way to Largo, and was what we now call a lion: 2. The admirable narrative of Selkirk, by Woodes Rogers; 3. Dampier's Voyages, in which book, and not in his imagination, he found the Mosquito Indian Friday, and certain moral reflections he has put into Robinson Crusoe's mouth. With these good hard facts he wrote a volume beyond praise. His rich storehouse of rare facts exhausted, he still went on—peopled his island, and produced a mediocre volume, such as anybody could write in his age, or ours. The immortal volume dragged its mediocre brother about with it, as men were attached to corpses under the good King Mezentius. The book was so great a success, that its author tried my anonymuncule's theory; he took the field armed with his imagination only, unadulterated by facts. What was the result? The same writer produced another "Robinson Crusoe," which the public read for its title, and promptly damned upon its merits: it has literally disappeared from literature.

"The Apparition of Mrs. Veal" is written on a plan which, according to my anonymuncule, breeds general truths, and no lies. What! The sham certificate of the magistrate, and the sham apparition, minutely related with a single dishonest purpose, to trepan the public into buying the dead stock of "Drelincourt on Death"—these are not lies? I congratulate him on both branches of his theory.

The charge of public criminality my anonymuncle rests on this—"That I went upon a single case of habitual cruelty, and traduced a whole system and all the officials, and did all I could to make a great social experiment miscarry." This is one tissue of falsehoods. That no sanguinary abuses existed, except in one gaol, is a lie. The ordinary Bluebooks, written with rosewater, to please Colonel Jebb the Gaol King, revealed a shocking number of suicides, and a percentage of insanity, which, in a place where the average rate was reduced by stoppage of spirituous liquors, gave no just alarm. I had also personally inspected many gaols, and discovered terrible things: a cap of torture and infection in one northern gaol: in a southern gaol the prisoners were wakened several times at night, and their reason shaken thereby. In another gaol I found an old man sinking visibly to his grave under the system; nobody doubted it, nobody cared. In another, the chaplain, though a great enthusiast, let out that a woman had been put into the "black hole" by the gaoler, against his advice, and taken out a lunatic, and was still a lunatic, and the visiting justices had treated the case with levity. Then I studied the two extraordinary Bluebooks, viz., the Royal Commissioners' Report on Birmingham Gaol, and also on Leicester Gaol, of which last this impudent, ignorant, person has evidently never heard. Then I conversed with one of the Royal Commissioners, and he told me the horrors of Leicester Gaol had so affected one of the Commissioners that it had made him seriously ill for more than a month. Enlightened by all these studies, and being also a man qualified to see deeper into human nature than the Gaol King, or any of his military subordinates, I did what the anonymous Press had done on a vast scale without reproach from any anonymuncle: I struck a blow in defence of outraged law and outraged humanity. But unlike the Press, to whom the prison rules are unknown, I did not confound the system with all its abuses; on the contrary, I conducted the case thus: I placed before the reader not one government official, but two—the gaoler and the chaplain: the gaoler eternally breaking the prison rules, and the chaplain eternally appealing to the prison rules. At last, after inflicting many miseries by repeated breaches of the prison rules, the gaoler does a poor boy to death; and then I bring in a third government.

official, who dismisses the gaoler. Now, since the prison rules were the conditions of the national experiment, I clearly supported the national experiment in most particulars. I admit that, in two respects, I did try hard to modify the experiment: I urged on practical men its extremeliability to abuse, and I wrote down the crank, and gave my reasons. This irritated government officials for months; but at last they saw I was right, and abolished the crank, which was a truly hellish invention to make labour contemptible and unremunerative, and theft eternal. They have since conceded to me other points I had demanded; and, in virtue of these improvements, I am, on a small scale, a public benefactor, and have modified, not disturbed, the national experiment.

Now let any one examine the files of September, 1853, and see what an onslaught a hundred anonymous writers made on the gaols. How is it that not one of these is dubbed a national malefactor? Simply, because my anonymuncule is not jealous of them. They, like me, did their duty to the nation; they lashed that Birmingham Hell, which disgraced, not England only, but human nature, and eighteen months afterwards they lashed the English judges for not inflicting a proper punishment on the criminal gaoler. These men, like me, wrote humanity, philosophy, sound law, and good gospel, in a case that cried aloud to God and man for all four. To be sure they wrote on sand, I wrote on brass. But those immortal things are not changed by sand or brass. Whether you print them didactically or dramatically makes no moral difference. I was a national benefactor, one of many. Let me go with the rest, undistinguished. Whoever singles me out, and calls one national benefactor a national criminal, is a liar and a scoundrel. I beg pardon, he would be, if he was a man; but your anonymuncule is not a man, as I understand the word—he is a creature with no genuine convictions whatever. He will write against barbarity in prisons, asylums, hospitals, poorhouses, and all dark places; and, if a man with higher powers writes more effectually against those barbarities, he will eat his own words, and defend Hell. There are several anonymuncula of this sort in England, who would deny their God on the spot, if they caught Mr. Reade singing a hymn. I begin to suspect this is one of them strayed into an honester country, and disgracing it.

His objections to "Put Yourself in His Place" are a tissue of lies. He says I have attacked Trades Unions. A direct falsehood. I have distinctly defended them, and do defend them.

He intimates I draw a vital distinction between my club and an Union. A direct falsehood. I have plainly disowned all such distinctions.

He says I have slurred the faults of the masters. A lie. I have detailed and denounced them again and again.

He intimates I have not read the Bluebooks on Mines and Factories. A mistake. I am deeply versed in them, as he will find, if I live.

He complains that I have not taken into account the diseases and short lives of the Sheffield cutlers. A falsehood. I have gone more minutely into them than any living man but Dr. Hall; have pointed out the remedies, and blamed the masters for not employing their superior intelligence to save the men. "You call your men 'Hands,'" say I: "learn to see they are men."

Understand me, I would not apply harsh terms to my anonymuncle, if these several mistakes were advanced in a literary notice. But the whole article is an indictment; and in an indictment a falsehood is a lie. He has either been to the depths of his inner consciousness to learn the contents of my book, or else he has employed another anonymuncle, or some inaccurate woman, to read it for him, and so between two fools—you know the proverb. "Put Yourself in His Place" is at issue with this writer on one point only. I am not so sloppy-minded as to confound the Manchester district with the town of Manchester. That district numbers two million people, is infected with trade outrage, is losing its sympathy with the law even in face of murder, and is ceasing to be England. Nothing is more shallow than the frivolity with which Mr. Harrison and other one-sided men dismiss this terrible phenomenon as exceptional. He, who has studied human nature, and the Bluebooks, so deeply as I have, and searched the provincial journals, knows that not two but forty trades have committed outrages, and that the exceptional ruffianism of certain Manchester trades is not a genuine exception, but only the uneducated workman's ruffianism carried fairly out. That the Sheffield outrages were stale when I wrote—is a lie. They have never intermitted. Blue-book exposure did not affect them for a moment. The town turned Roebuck out of Parliament, for not burking the exposure; and went on with their petards, and other deadly practices; see the journals passim. Last year they knocked a whole row of non-union houses to pieces, and tried to slaughter the inmates. Were the miscreants at Thorncliffe cutlers? I thought they were this anonymuncle's pets, the miners. The fact is that the Union miners' hands, from John o' Groat's to Lizard Point, are red with the blood of non-union men. In the United States the trades are already steeped in human blood. Is America Sheffield, or Manchester?

The masters are just as egotistical as the men: but, unlike the men, they have never had recourse to violence. How long will that last? Does this dreamer imagine that capital cannot buy fighting agents, and ten thousand Colt revolvers, and a million grapeshot; and kill lawless ruffians by the hundred, when they commit felony by the hundred? When we come to this, and when the Unions have upset the British Constitution through the servility of the Commons and the blindness of the Peers, let it be remembered that a thinking novelist, a lover of his kind, encouraged the workmen in lawful combination, but wrote against their beastly ignorance and dirt, and their bloody violence and foul play. In such a case it is either books or bayonets. I have tried a book. Others will try bayonets, and anonymuncula will cry "Bravo!"—unless they catch sight of a popular author in the front ranks.

The author of "Put Yourself in His Place" is, in a very small way, a public benefactor. Whoever calls him a public criminal, is a liar and a scoundrel.

That in "Hard Cash" I painted all asylums as abodes of cruelty—is a lie. One of my asylums is governed by a most humane person, though crotchety. The solitary asylum in "A Terrible Temptation" is also a stronghold of humanity. Even in "Hard Cash" the only cruel asylum is governed, not by a physician, but a pawnbroker. As to the abuses pointed out in "Hard Cash," they really existed, and exist.

Can any man offer a fairer test of a book's veracity than I did? I said, in my preface to "Hard Cash," that the whole thing rested on a mass of legal evidence—Bluebooks, pamphlets, newspapers, private letters, diaries of alleged lunatics, reports of tried cases. I offered, in print, to show these, at my own house, to any anonymous writer who might care to profit by my labour—the labour of Hercules. I lived eighty yards from Piccadilly, a great fashionable thoroughfare, down which many of these gentry pass every fine day. How many do you suppose accepted this infallible test of mendacity or veracity in my book?

NOT ONE!

Not one of these hypocrites, who pretend to love truth, would walk eighty yards to reap a whole harvest of truth with next to no trouble.

No, they preferred to lie, unshackled by evidence, and to accuse me of being a liar like themselves.

This anonymuncle has read that printed challenge, and knows it was shirked. Yet he repeats the contemporary lie—which is now a greater lie than ever; for fresh evidence has poured in, both public and private. A gentleman in Dublin has recently been incarcerated, on certificates, in an asylum; has gone to the court with a habeas corpus, and been at once pronounced sane. A Manx drunkard has just been cajoled into Scotland, and incarcerated, on a medical certificate, as insane. These are public cases; so is Hall v. Semple, where a turbulent and drunken wife bought a doctor, and incarcerated her husband. Husband has sued doctor, and got damages. Add private cases. A tradesman in the North had a pretty wife. She went to a magistrate, and said he was mad; "And do, please, lock him up for me." "My pretty dear," says the magistrate, "I can't do that, unless you are sure he is mad." "Mad as a March hare!" replies that fair and tender spouse. Thereupon the magistrate issues his warrant, and the man is locked up. He was no more insane than his neighbours. He got his discharge, and came to me directly. I employed him in several matters.

A respectable tradesman in Cheltenham was incarcerated by his wife, and kept eleven years, while she maintained an illicit connection. He made his escape, and came to me. I lent him a solicitor, and told the parties interested to let him alone. They have never laid a finger on him since. The man is perfectly sane, and always was.

At Hanwell Asylum alone the keepers have murdered three lunatics, by breaking from eight to ten ribs and the breast-bone. The doctor, in every case, has told the coroner that the science he professes does not enable him to say positively that all these ribs were not broken by the man slipping down in a room; and I say that, if medicine was a science, it would possess the statistics of falls; which statistics are at present confined to my notebooks, and these reveal, that in mere tumbles, men break the projecting bones before they break the ribs; and that during the last twenty years only one man has broken so many as four of his own ribs, and he fell 120 feet.

I told the public, in the Pall Mall Gazette, the precise mode in which lunatics are murdered at Hanwell—viz., by the keepers walking up and down the victim on their knees, and pressing on him with their knees. A month later, two keepers were indicted for killing a man in Lancaster Asylum. The doctors puzzled a bit over his broken ribs, and conjectured that nine ribs were broken by pressure on the breast-bone; which is simply idiotic, as will be found by experiment on a skeleton. A witness went into the box, and swore he had seen the man murdered by repeated blows of the keepers' knees. For once, thank God, we nailed these miscreants, and they got seven years' penal servitude.

The author of "Hard Cash" is a public benefactor, in a small way. Whoever, after this, calls him a public criminal, is a liar and a scoundrel.

The last charge is trifling. Here is an ill-natured egotist accusing me of good-natured egotism. The charge, made with moderation, might perhaps have been sustained; but his malice and mendacity have overshot the mark, and given me a right to correct him.

He begins with the Sham-Sample-Swindle. He cites a single passage from my letter to Bushnan. That passage, so taken, is egotistical, but not if you consider the context and its purpose. Bushnan was a humbug, who wrote at me publicly, and said there were no abuses in asyls. You will smile, perhaps, when I tell you that, at that moment, there were abuses in his own asylum so serious, that, very soon after, he was turned out of it. Well, I knocked Bushnan on the head with a lot of examples this anonymuncule has read and shirked, the better to repeat Bushnan's falsehood. From that list of facts I could not afford to exclude my own experience—it was too good evidence to suppress. Yes, at a time when my income was not large, I did, for love of justice, humanity, and law, protect an injured fellow-citizen, in whom I had no other interest. He was a sane man, unjustly incarcerated. I fed him, clothed him, backed him, and, after a bitter and costly struggle, got him an annuity of £100 a year for life from those who incarcerated him. Perhaps, if an anonymuncule were capable of such an action, he might mention it spontaneously and more than once. It was dragged out of me by a liar, and I never repeated it in my own person.

For an author to introduce his own character into a novel looks like egotism ; but it is not so uncommon as this illiterate person imagines. Eccentric characters are rare, and valuable to the artist ; and this eccentric character was intruded not egotistically but artistically. It fitted the occasion and forced itself on me.

"Oh, but," says the anonymuncle, "your sketch is one strain of eulogy on the person and mind of Rolfe." Was ever so impudent a lie as this ? It is the exact opposite of the truth. It should be remembered that, in fiction, I am not a satirist ; I am one who sees the bright side of a mixed character, and I dare say Rolfe has benefited a little by that, along with a score more characters that I have drawn. But compare Rolfe with his predecessors in his own line of business—with Mr. Eden, Dr. Sampson, Dr. Amboyne Have I ever handled him with the reverence, the affection, the gusto I have shown them ? Have I disguised his foibles ? Have I not let Dr. Suaby get the better of him in dialogue ? Who gets the better of Eden or Amboyne ?

"But," says my anonymuncle, "you have said the best judges adore his works." This is an impudent lie ; I never said a syllable of the kind.

"Personally he is most striking and interesting," etc. This whole sentence is an impudent lie. I have described the man as personally uninteresting and commonplace : an unwieldy person, a rolling gait, commonplace features, a mild brown eye, not bright. I have told the truth pro and con, just as I should of any other person I was inspecting with an artist's eye.

But the best possible answer to this falsehood is to republish the comment of an American critic, that has come to me :— "It is alleged that in this character Reade has intended to represent himself, and a cry of horror is raised, by those who have never read 'Copperfield,' 'Pendennis,' or 'Amelia,' and never seen Raphael's portrait of himself. We are inclined to think that Rolfe and Reade are one, because the novels of the latter could scarcely be as perfect as they are, without the patient, unremitting drudgery ascribed to the former, and also because the character is drawn in a pitiless fashion, which Reade never elsewhere employs towards his virtuous personages. The plain exterior of the man, and his self-conceit, all his foibles, are kept persistently before the reader, in a style which seems to indicate conscientious self-analysis, and in gratitude for the picture we fail to blame the artist."—The Charleston Courier.

One of these writers is clearly tampering with truth. Let the book itself decide which.

Two virulent critiques on my works, in Canadian papers, end rather suspiciously with the same suggestion. This indicates the same hand, and is an abuse of the anonymous. See my preliminary remark in voce anonymuncle. The suggestion of which the anonymuncle is so proud is this, that Mr. Rolfe, previously identified with Mr. Reade, may perhaps end his days in a madhouse.

That shall be as God pleases. He gave me whatever good gifts I have, my hatred of inhumanity and injustice, and my loathing of everything that is dastardly and mean, from a British anonymuncle up to a Carolina skunk; and He can take these gifts away in a moment, by taking my reason.

I shall be no nearer that calamity for this writer's suggestion, and he will be no farther off it, since such suggestions sometimes offend God, as well as disgust men.

But this is certain: should he ever transplant into any business less base and below the law's lash than anonymous detraction, the morals and practices he has shown in slandering me, he will, soon or late, find his way, not to an asylum, but a gaol.

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES READE.

October, 1871.

This letter was written in reply to a malicious and defamatory libel by Mr. Goldwin Smith in the Toronto Globe. The character of that libel can be divined by the reply. I sent it to the Globe, but, as criticasters dare not encounter superior writers, on fair terms, it was suppressed.

A SUPPRESSED LETTER.

THE Athenæum has lately published some critiques on dramatic authors, signed "Q.," and written with more confidence than knowledge. The article on Mr. Tom Taylor shocked Mr. Charles Reade's sense of justice and propriety, and he wrote a letter to the editor of the Athenæum. That gentleman suppressed the letter. Mr. Reade objects to this as doubly unfair, and requests the editor of the paper to which this is sent to give the letter, and its suppression, due publicity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "ATHENÆUM."

2, ALBERT TERRACE, KNIGHTSBRIDGE,
April 25th, 1871.

SIR,—An article appeared in last week's Athenæum entitled "Mr. Tom Taylor," and written by one "Q." The article is unjust and needlessly discourteous to a writer of merit, and I must appeal to your sense of justice to let a disinterested critic correct your "Q.," and undeceive your public.

I will take the two writers in their intellectual order.

MR. TOM TAYLOR

first distinguished himself as a scholar; obtained a fellowship at Trinity College, Cambridge. "Mutatis Studiis" he wrote for the theatre; and his early pieces were nearly all original, though, at that time, originality was rarer than now. Between the years 1852 and 1856 I had myself the honour of working with him on four original dramas. I found him rich in knowledge, fertile in invention, and rapid in execution. Of late years he has been a very busy man; he is the head of a public office, and the nation takes the cream of his day: he is a steady contributor to the Times and to Punch, has published two biographies of great research, and yet has contrived to write many good dramas in prose and verse. The mind is finite, so is the day; and I observe that, writing for the stage in the mere fragments of his time, he now invents less, and imitates more, than he did some years ago. But, taking his whole career, the title of a dramatic inventor cannot be honestly denied him. He may not be a dramatist of the highest class—what living Englishman is?—but he resembles the very highest in this, that he sometimes adapts or imitates, without servility, and sometimes invents. This accomplished writer in so many styles is the only man who of late years has filled a theatre by poetical dramas. His last is “Joan of Arc.”

Is not this a remarkable man, as times go, and entitled to decent respect from the mere shrimps and minnows, who write about literature, because they cannot write literature?

is a variety of the literary insect “Criticaster.” He has been good enough to reveal his method: he went to the Queen’s Theatre to see “Joan of Arc,” and weigh the author’s lines, and the author himself, in his little balance. He qualified himself as follows: he turned his back on the stage, and fell to talking with another criticaster—the illustrious P.?—about other plays of Mr. Taylor. They did not talk improvingly, for they merely played off a stale literary fraud which I exposed two years ago under the title of the “Sham Sample Swindle.” For all that, this part of Q.’s narrative is interesting to me: I have long been asking myself to what class of society, and to what depths of the human intellect, belong those chattering snobs, who always spoil a play for poor me, whenever I go to the public part of a theatre.

“Revealed the secret stands of Nature’s work.”

They are criticasters; sent in there, by too confiding editors, to hold their tongues, and give their minds to the play.

At the last scene it suddenly occurred to “Q.” that he must not go away knowing nothing of the play he was sent there to know all about, and this led to a dialogue I reproduce verbatim, simply remarking that to me, who am a critic, it reads like bad fiction.

" 'May I venture to ask,' said I, 'if you have reason to suppose that the drama we are now witnessing is derived from any foreign original?' My friend was expanding his crush-hat. 'Certainly not,' he replied with emphasis, pointing to the stage, whereon they were roasting Mrs. Rousby: 'I know no other dramatic author who, left to himself, would conceive the notion of presenting before an audience such brutal realism as that.' And my friend left."

Now "P." never uttered those words. Every nation has two languages; the spoken, and the written; so uncouth and involved a sentence never flowed from a bad writer's mouth, it could only wriggle from a bad writer's pen. However, there it is—a monument of impudence, insolence, and ignorance. What these poor groppers in the back slums of the drama stigmatize as unprecedented realism has been enacted before admiring Europe, by the most poetical actress of the century, in the first theatre, and the most squeamish, of the civilised world. 'Joan of Arc' was one of Rachel's characters, and, in her hands, was burned to death night after night. The burning was represented with what a critic would call "terrible fidelity," a criticaster "brutal realism." She stood on a small working platform arranged to fall about two feet to a stop. The effect was truthful, but appalling; for, when the fire had burned a little time, the great actress, who did nothing by halves, turned rigid, and seemed to fall like a burnt log from her supports. It conveyed, and was intended to convey, that the lower extremities had been burned away, and the figure dropped into the flames. Of course the curtain fell like lightning then, and, up to the moment preceding that awful incident, the face of the actress shone like an angel's, and was divine with the triumph of the great soul over the very flames that were destroying the mortal body.

Believe me, sir, no author, French or English, can give this actress a nobler opportunity than this of rising to the level of Poetry and History.

As to the notion that death by fire is unfit to be presented coram populo, this is the chimera of a few Anglo-Saxon duncees afflicted with the known intellectual foible of their race—the trick of drawing distinctions without a difference; in other words, the inability to generalize. Death by fire is neither more nor less fit to be presented faithfully than death by poison, or cold steel. Only the death of "Joan d'Arc" by fire, with her rapt eyes fixed on the God she is going to, is of a grander and more poetical nature than the death of "Hamlet" or of "Macbeth."

That the performance of this great scene at the Queen's Theatre suggested nothing nobler and more poetic to "P." and "Q." than an actress roasted, is not the fault of Mr. Taylor, nor of History, which dictated the situation.

No Frenchman was ever the hog to comment on the same situation in a similar spirit, and I am therefore driven reluctantly to the conclusion, that the brutal nation, which burned the maid of Orleans, is still, in some respects, at the bottom of mankind.

Of course, if the part was vilely acted there would be some excuse for "P." and "Q." But, on the contrary, I hear it is well acted. The fault then lies with the criticsasters. It is the old, old story: Parvis omnia parva. When little men, with little heads, little hearts, little knowledge, little sensibility, and great vanity, go into a theatre, not to take in knowledge and humanity, but to give out ignorance and malice, not to profit by their mental superior, but to disparage him, they are steeled against ennobling influences, and bonded to beauties however obvious. But the retribution is sure. "Depreciation" is the writer's road to ruin. Men see, in our difficult art, by the divine gift, and the amiable habit, of appreciation: to appreciate our gifted contemporaries, is to gather unconsciously a thousand flowers for our own basket.

The depreciator despises his gifted contemporaries, and so gathers nothing but weeds and self-deception. The appreciator makes a name, a fortune, and a signature. The depreciator tickles his own vanity, but gets to admire nothing, feel nothing, create nothing and be nothing—but a cypher signed by an Initial.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES READE.

"FOUL PLAY."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "EXAMINER AND TIMES."

SIR,—The Manchester Examiner, of June 25, contains some remarks upon the above drama, which amount to this, that it is respectably written, but poorly acted, at the Theatre Royal. This summary is calculated to mislead the public, and to wound artists of merit. Permit me, then, to correct the error.

A dramatist is entirely at the mercy of his actors; let him write like an angel, they can reduce him to the level of Poor Poll. You may, therefore, lay it down as a mathematical certainty that a drama is very well acted if it holds an audience tight for three hours and forty minutes, eliciting laughter, tears, applause, and few or no yawns. To go into detail, which is the surest way, Mr. Coleman plays Robert Penfold with the variations of manner that difficult character requires. Easy and natural in the prologue, he warms with the advancing action. His manner of dealing with the difficult tirade in the fourth act shows a thorough knowledge of his art, and he works the act up to a climax with a fire that is invaluable to me, and rare on any stage. On the whole, his is an earnest, manly performance. Miss Henrietta Simms is an actress—young in years, but old in experience—who has often played leading business at the Adelphi Theatre, London. She has presence and dignity, yet can be sprightly without effort. She lacks neither fire, tenderness, nor variety; and, as one example how far she can carry those three qualities, let me point to four speeches she delivers in the principal island scene. They follow upon Robert Penfold's defence, and might be profitably studied both by actors and critics. But elocution is only a part of the great histrionic art. In fact, what reveals the true artist at once, is his dumb play; by which I mean the play of the countenance while another actor is speaking. The faces of second-rate actors become less expressive when they are silent, but the dumb play of first-rate actors never intermits, and is in as high a key as their play. Now in this branch of her art Miss Simms has hardly a living rival. Let anybody who cares to test this statement, watch the changes of her countenance when Robert Penfold and the others are speaking to her. Let him observe her when Arthur Wardlaw places in her hands the pearl from Godsend Island, gradually her eyes dilate, her lips part, and, long before she speaks the commonplace line I have given her, all the sweet memories of love and Godsend Island seem to flow into her face, and elevate it with a tenderness that has really something divine. Such strokes of genius as this partake of inspiration, and are the glory of that enchanting art, which is so plentifully written about, but, alas! so little comprehended. Now for the smaller parts, which, as your contributor seemed to think, play themselves. I know the London stage by heart, and there is not an actor on it who can look and play Wylie as well as Mr. Horsman does. Mrs. Horsman's performance has, upon the whole, breadth and geniality. Mr. Edwards is a tragedian, who plays a part he dislikes, to oblige us. The part contains few of those strong effects which suit him, but he never misses one. The fourth act of this play reveals a sailor lying on a bank, sick, and near his end. He is left alone, and has a soliloquy of eight lines. With these eight lines, and the business that belongs to them, an actor holds a large audience hushed and breathless, and draws many a tear from men and women. And who is this magician? It is Mr. Royce, the low comedian of Mr. Coleman's company. Is it usual in this city for low comedians to draw more tears with eight lines than our tragedians draw with eight plays? If not, why pass over Mr. Royce as if I had written him along with the lines he delivers so exquisitely? Mr. Chute, a manager, and a veteran actor, plays the little part of Wardlaw Senior to oblige me, and I begin to fear he plays it too well. The purity, the quiet dignity, and gentlemanly ease with which he invests it are too rare upon the stage to be promptly appreciated. All I can say is, that since Downton's time I have seen nothing of this class so easy, natural, and perfect.

I fear, sir, I have trespassed on your courtesy ; but I am sure you would not willingly lend yourself to an injustice, and I even think and hope that, should your critic revisit the theatre, he will come round to my opinion—viz., that "Foul Play" owes a large share of its success to the talent and zeal of the performers, and especially of those who play the small characters.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES READE.

PALATINE HOTEL,

June 26th, 1868.

THE SHAM SAMPLE SWINDLE.

"FOUL PLAY."

THE world is so wicked and so old, that it is hard to invent a new knavery. Nevertheless, certain writers are now practising an old fraud with a new face, and gulling the public and the Press.

Nothing baffles the literary detective so much as a nameless knavery. I begin, therefore, by depriving the fraud in question of that unfair advantage, and I call it—

THE SHAM SAMPLE SWINDLE.

Examples.—1. A farmer prepares his sample of wheaten grain for market. His duty is to put his two hands fairly into the bulk and so fill his sample bag. But one day, in my experience, a Berkshire farmer picked his grain for show that is, he went through the sample, and merely removed the inferior grains. He stood in the market with the sham sample, and readily sold twenty load of grain at more than its value. The fraud was detected, and the farmer driven out of the market.

2. Suppose some malicious rogue had access to a farmer's sample-bag, and were to remove the fine grains, and leave the inferior—that would destroy the farmer's sale and be also a sham sample swindle. Of course nothing so wicked was ever done in agriculture; but there is a baser trade in the world than agriculture, and plied by dirtier hands than those which scatter dung upon our fields.

3. I read one day an article in a Quarterly Review, in which these two expressions occurred more than once, "the author of 'Robinson Crusoe,' " and "the author of the 'Lily and the Bee.'" Now, Defoe wrote several stupid stories, and one masterpiece; Warren wrote several powerful stories and one foolish rhapsody; yet here, in the name of science (for criticism is science, or it is nothing) is Warren defined by his exceptional failure, and Defoe by his exceptional success; and that is one form of the sham sample swindle. [N.B. The dead are apt to get the sunny side of this swindle, and the living the windy side.]

4. A writer produces a great book. With all its beauties it is sure to have flaws, being written by man, who is an imperfect creature. The sham sample swindler picks out the flaw or flaws, quotes them bodily, which gives an air of honesty, and then says, "We could give a host of other examples, but these will serve to show the general character of the work."

The swindle lies, in the words italicised. They declare a sham sample to be a true sample; and, observe, this is a falsehood that cannot fail to deceive the reader. For why? The grain of truth that supports the falsehood is shown; the mass of truth that contradicts the falsehood is hidden.

5. A great work of fiction is written; it is rich in invention and novel combination; but, as men of genius have a singularly keen appreciation of all that is good, and can pick out pearls where obscure scribblers could see nothing but rubbish, the author has, perhaps, borrowed one or two things from other written sources, and incorporated them happily with the bulk of his invention. If so, they ought to be pointed out to the public, and are, of course, open to stricture from unlearned critics, who do not know to what an extent Shakespeare, Virgil, Molière, Corneille, Defoe, Le Sage, Scott, Dumas, &c., have pursued this very method, and how much the public gain by it. But the sham sample swindler is not content to point out the borrowed portion, and say honestly, so and so is not original, the rest may be. His plan is to quote the plagiarism, and then add, "And that part of the work we do not quote is all cut from the same cloth."

He tells this lie in cold blood, with his eyes upon the truth; and, as I said before, it is a fraud that can never fail on the spot, because the borrowed part of the work is in sight, the bulk of the work is out of sight.

So much by way of general description.

I come now to a remarkable example: Several journalists not blessed with much power of reasoning on literary subjects are repeating that "Foul Play," a three volume novel, which originally appeared in this magazine, is a servile copy of an obscure French drama, called Le Portefeuille Rouge.

Not to waste time on echoes, I have traced this rumour to its source, a monthly magazine, called the Mask. Here, the writer, in a form, the modesty and good taste of which I shall leave to the judge in whose court I may select to try the proprietors of the Mask for the libel, conveys to the public a comparison of the two works, and contemptuously comments upon the more brilliant and important of the two.

He conducts the comparison on a two-fold plan. First he deals with the incidents of the two works. Secondly, with the dialogue. But how? In the first branch of comparison he suppresses $\frac{2}{10}$ ths of the striking incidents in "Foul Play," and at least $\frac{8}{10}$ ths of the strong incidents in Le Portefeuille Rouge, and, then, by slightly twisting the few incidents that survive this process, and by arbitrarily wording this double sham sample swindle in similar language, (which language is his, not ours), he makes the two works appear much alike in incident, although they are on the whole quite unlike in incident.

Secondly, he comes to the dialogue. And here he is met by a difficulty none of the sham samplers who preceded him had to face. He could not find a line in "Foul Play" that had been suggested by a line in Le Portefeuille Rouge. What was to be done? He hit upon the drollest expedient. He selected a dialogue from Le Portefeuille Rouge and set it cheek by jowl, not with parallel passages in "Foul Play," which was what his argument demanded, but with a lame and incorrect translation of itself. Here is a specimen of his method:—

Pour rien au monde, je n'aurais voulu vous laisser seul ici; mais, d'un autre côté, quels risques n'auriez-vous pas courus en vous embarquant avec nous? . . .

KERVEGUEN.

HELENE.

Unjustly condemned, my father.

KERVEGUEN.

Heaven is my witness that I hope it with all my soul.

And so on for seventy speeches. By this method it is craftily insinuated to the reader that seventy speeches of "Foul Play" could be quoted to prove the plagiarism, though not one speech is quoted. Curious, that a manoeuvre so transparent should succeed. But it has succeeded—for a time.

Unfortunately for truth and justice, the sham sample swindle, being founded on suppression, has the advantage of brevity; whereas its exposure must always be long and tedious. But, since in this case it has attacked not my ability only, but my probity in business, I hope my readers will be patient, and consider for once how hard it is, after many months of ardent and successful labour and invention to be not only decried, but slandered and insulted for my pain!

I know no positive antidote to a dishonest comparison, except an honest comparison. A novel is not the same thing as a drama; but no doubt they have three essentials in common. 1. Characters. 2. Incidents. 3. Dialogue. Let us, then, compare the two works on that treble basis.

CHARACTERS IN LE PORTE-FEUILLE ROUGE.

1. Duromé, a banker and loose-liver.

2. De Folbert, a daring, middle-aged ruffian, fearing nothing, loving nothing. The trite monster of Melodrama, that never existed in nature.

3. Maurice, a young layman, interesting by his sufferings and adventures, but as to character, utterly commonplace.

4. Faustin, Duromé's servant.

5. Bouquin, a sailor.

6. Le Père Lajoie.

CHARACTERS IN "FOUL PLAY."

1. Old Wardlaw, an honourable merchant.

2. Young Wardlaw, a weak youth, led into crime by cowardice; a knave tortured by remorse and rendered human by an earnest love.

3. Michael Penfold, a worthy timid old man, cashier to Wardlaw, Senior.

4. Robert Penfold, his son, a clergyman, and a man of rare gifts, muscular, learned, inventive, patient, self-denying, delicate-minded: a marked character; new in fiction.

7. Daniel.
8. Garnier, a surgeon.
9. Vestris.
10. Chasse.
11. Le Comte de Kerveguen, captain of a vessel,—who has got a daughter.

12. Hélène, daughter of the preceding,—a weak, amiable girl, who parts with her virtue the first fair opportunity. This character is undistinguishable from a thousand others in French fiction.

13. Madame Delaunay, aunt to the preceding.

14. Miss Deborah, Hélène's gouvernante.

15. Jacqueline, Faustin's wife.

16. Mesdemoiselles Dufréne, Duthé, and Fel, young ladies it may be as well not to describe too minutely.

17. Ursule, a lady's-maid.

18. Marcel, a French Cockney, who gets sent to sea, an admirable character: indeed, the only new character in the drama.

19. An ape.

5. General Rolleston, governor of a penal settlement, and a soldier, who, however, has got a daughter.

6. Helen (daughter of the preceding), a young lady of marked character, hard to win and hard to lose, virtuous under temptation, and distinguished by a tenacity of purpose which is rarely found in her sex. Upon the whole, a character almost new in fiction.

7. Hiram Hudson, captain of the Proserpine, a good seaman, who has been often employed to cast away ships. When drunk, he descants on his duty to his employers. This character is based on reality, and is entirely new in fiction.

8. Joseph Wylie, his mate, a man of physical strength, yet cunning; a rogue, but a manly one, goaded by avarice, but stung by remorse.

9. Cooper, a taciturn sailor, with an antique friendship for talkative Welch.

10. Welch, a talkative sailor, with an antique friendship for taciturn Cooper. These two sailors are characters entirely new in fiction. So are their adventures and their deaths.

11. Joshua Fullalove, a character created by myself in Hard Cash, and reproduced in Foul Play with the consent of my collaborateur.

12. Burt, a detective.

13. Undercliffe, an expert; a character based on reality, but entirely new in fiction. He reads handwriting wonderfully, but cannot read circumstances.

14. Mrs. Undercliffe, mother to the expert, a woman who has no skill at handwriting, but reads faces and circumstances keenly.

15. Tollemache, a barrister.

16. Meredith, a barrister of a different stamp.

17. Sarah Wilson.

18. A squinting barber, who sees a man in trouble, and so demands 10s. for shaving him.

19. Adams, a bill broker.

20. Somebody, an underwriter.

21. Nancy Rouse, a lodging-house keeper and washerwoman, and a character new in fiction.

Now it is an axiom in literary criticism, that to invent incidents is a lower art than to invent characters; and the writer in the Mask fires off this axiom at me. So be it. I find nineteen distinct characters in Le Portefeuille Rouge, and out of the nineteen, fifteen bear no shadow of resemblance, in act or word, to any character in "Foul Play:" yet of these fifteen many are the very engines of the play. I find twenty-one distinct characters in "Foul Play," and, out of these, seventeen bear no resemblance, either in deed or word, to any character in Le Portefeuille Rouge. Yet these seventeen are busy characters, and take a large share in the plot. As to the small balance of four persons, the two heroines are so opposite in characters that no writer, whose eye was on the French Hélène, could possibly have created the English Helen. The same remark applies to Do Folbert and Arthur Wardlaw: they are both rogues; but then they are opposite rogues. Why, they differ as widely as a bold highwayman and an anonymous slanderer.

Setting aside Incident, which awaits its turn in this comparison, I can find no character—except that of General Rolleston—which resembles a character in "Foul Play." Kerveguen is a sailor and the captain of a ship; so far he corresponds, not with General Rolleston, but with the Captain Hudson of "Foul Play." But then this sailor has a resolute character and a daughter, and she is the heroine of the drama. Now the soldier Rolleston has also a resolute character, and a daughter who is the heroine of "Foul Play." The plagiarism of character, if any, is manifestly confined to the heroine's father, one character out of thirty-eight and more, who act, and speak, and think, and feel in the two works. How far does this correspond with the impression the sham sampler has sought to create?

We come now to the incidents of the two works, and these, handled on the above honest method, yield precisely the same result. But to work this out on paper would take a volume. Something however may be done in a shorter compass by the help of figures. "Foul Play," then, is contained in 25 numbers of Once a Week. And these numbers average, I believe, 14 columns each, or rather more. The first number is very busy, and deals with crime and love. The prologue of the French drama does not deal with love at all, and with crime of quite another character. In the story the crime is forgery; and that crime remains part of the plot to the end. In the drama the true generative incident is murder. That murder is committed by a villain who had, previously, forged; but the previous forgery could be omitted without affecting the plot. The fundamental incident of the drama is murder. The two fundamental incidents of "Foul Play" are forgery, and the scuttling of a ship to defraud the underwriters.

From No. 1 to No. 4, "Foul Play," though full of incidents, has not an idea in common with the drama. In the fourth number the two works have this in common, that the hero and heroine are on board one ship, and that ship gets lost. But in the drama the father is there, and in the story he is not; the hero and heroine are brought on board by entirely different incidents in the two works, and the French ship is fired by mere accident. Not so the English ship: that is scuttled by order of the heroine's lover: and so the knave is made the means of throwing the woman he loves upon the protection of the friend he has ruined. This is invention and combination of a high order. But calling upon an unforeseen accident to effect a solitary purpose and then dismissing the accident for ever, is just what any fool can do at any moment, and it is all the authors of the French drama have attempted to do in that situation. From the 4th number to the last page but one of the 17th number, "Foul Play" diverges entirely from the drama, and the drama from "Foul Play." The existence of those thirteen numbers (more than one half of the entire story) is virtually denied by the sham sampler in these words:—

whole. They are the poem of the work. They deal with the strange, the true, the terrible, and the beautiful. Here are to be found the only numbers which I received complete in form as well as in substance from my accomplished collaborateur, and it was this half of the work which drew in one week forty notices from American journals. Those journals, commenting on the adventures and contrivances of certain persons wrecked on the Auckland Islands, remarked that History was imitating fiction, and so sent their readers to "Foul Play." History will never imitate Le Portefeuille Rouge, any more than I have descended to imitate Le Portefeuille Rouge. At the end of the 17th number of "Foul Play," General Rolleston lands on the unknown island, and finds his daughter and the innocent convict living alone together. And in the 9th scene of the 2nd act of Portefeuille Rouge, Kerveguen comes with other characters, and finds his daughter, the innocent convict, and Marcel. This is a good and generative situation, and looks like plagiarism in the novel. But the moment we come to the treatment, the acts and the words of all the three interlocutors are so remarkably different in the two works, that no honest and discerning man can believe the writer of that scene in "Foul Play" had his eye on the drama. In the story the father and daughter meet alone with wild raptures equal to the occasion; a sacred scene. In the play they meet before witnesses, and the French dramatists with very bad judgment have allowed the low comedian to be present. He opens his mouth, and of course the scene goes to the devil at once.

In the subsequent dialogue and business, I find great variations.

IN THE DRAMA

Hélène sides at once with Maurice, and argues the case with her father, and Maurice is almost passive. Maurice is never master of the situation. On the contrary, he tries to follow Hélène on board, and is shot like a dog in the attempt. Hélène never undertakes to clear him. All is left to accident.

IN THE NOVEL

Helen puts Robert Penfold on his defence, and on his convincing her he is innocent, declares her love. Then Robert Penfold becomes master of the situation, and it is by his own will, and high sense of honour, he remains, and the parting is effected. And Helen and her father undertake to clear him in England; which promise, on Helen's part, with its many consequences, is the very plot of the sequel.

From this to the end of the work, we have seven numbers of "Foul Play," and two acts of Portefeuille Rouge, and not an idea in common between the two. So that twenty-three numbers out of twenty-five, "Foul Play," have not an idea in common with the French drama; two numbers out of twenty-five have each a bare situation which looks like one in the drama, but on closer inspection prove to be handled so differently that the charge of plagiarism is untenable.

"Foul Play" is illustrated by Mr. Du Maurier. The said Du Maurier is a good actor, and has dramatic tendencies. He is sure to have picked out some of the more dramatic situations in "Foul Play" for illustration, and, if the incidents of "Foul Play" came from the Portefeuille Rouge, Mr. Du Maurier's sketches would serve to illustrate that drama. I have examined his illustrations, twelve in number; I cannot find one that fits any scene or incident in the French drama. If they were all pasted into the Portefeuille Rouge, no reader of that drama would be able to apply any one of them to anything in the whole composition. Bring your minds to bear on this fact. It is worth study.

And now I come to the dialogue of the works. Here the comparison is a blank. There is nothing to compare. The writer in the Mask dared not put seventy speeches from "Foul Play" by the side of his seventy speeches from Portefeuille Rouge. He dared not deal thus honestly with even seven speeches. And shall I tell you why? Because there is not one line in "Foul Play" that corresponds with a line in Portefeuille Rouge.

Shakespeare, in the "Merry Wives of Windsor," has the following line:

"I'll rather be unmannerly than troublesome."

And Molière, in his Bourgeois Gentilhomme, has this line:

"J'aime mieux être incivil qu'importun."

I can find no such apparent plagiarism in all the pages of "Foul Play" and Le Portefeuille Rouge.

I conclude this subject with the following statements of matters known to me:—

I. I have carefully examined all the MS. contributed to "Foul Play" by Mr. Dion Boucicault. This MS. consists of two or three numbers complete in form as well as in substance; and also of a great many plans of numbers, sketches, materials and inventive ideas of singular merit and value. In all this

MS. I find only one word that can have come from Portefeuille Rouge, and that word is—Helen.

2. I myself never saw Le Portefeuille Rouge until after the article in the Mask appeared—never saw it nor heard of it.

3. The one valuable situation the two works contain in common may have come to me from Mr. Boucicault, but if so it came in conversation, along with many other things quite as good, and the guilt, if any, of selecting the naked idea, which is all we have used, lies with me, who never saw the Portefeuille Rouge.

4. I handled, treated, and wrote every line, on which the charge of unprincipled plagiarism has been founded, and I have got my MS. to prove it.

5. Any person connected with literature can compare the Portefeuille Rouge and “Foul Play” at my house: and I shall be grateful to any literary brother who may have the honesty and patience to do it.

6. The writer in the Mask has done this, and having done it, he must have known that his charge of unprincipled plagiarism was false and disingenuous. Yet, knowing this, he was not content to do me a moderate injury: it was not enough to defraud an honoured writer of his reputation as an inventor; he must attack my character as a gentleman, and as a fair dealer with publishers and managers. On this account I am going to make an example of him. I shall sue him for libel, and, when we meet in the Court of Common Pleas, I shall repeat upon my oath as a Christian all the statements, which now I make in these columns upon my honour as a gentleman.

I shall ask leave to return to the sham sample swindle on some other occasion, and in a way that will be less egotistical and more interesting to your readers. It is the most potent swindle in creation, and all honest writers should combine to expose it.]

"IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND."

FROM THE "READER," October 28th, 1865.

SIR,—You have published (inadvertently, I hope) two columns of intemperate abuse aimed at my drama, and mendacious personalities levelled at myself.

The author of all this spite is not ashamed to sympathise with the heartless robbers from whom justice and law have rescued my creation and my property.

(Query—Was he not set on by those very robbers?)

He even eulogizes a ruffian who, on the 4th October, raised a disturbance in the Princess's Theatre, and endeavoured to put down my play by clamour, but was called to order by the respectable portion of the audience.

Have you any sense of justice and fair play where the party assailed is only an author of repute, and the assailant has the advantage of being an obscure scribbler? If so, you will give me a hearing in my defence. I reply in one sentence to two columns of venom and drivel. I just beg to inform honest men and women that your anonymous contributor, who sides with piratical thieves against the honest inventor, and disparages Charles Reade, and applauds one Tomlins—is Tomlins.

I am,

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES READE.

THE "EDINBURGH REVIEW" AND THE "SATURDAY REVIEW."

A LETTER.

SATURDAY REVIEW,—You have brains of your own, and good ones. Do not you echo the bray of such a very small ass as the Edinburgh Review. Be more just to yourself and to me. Reflect! I must be six times a greater writer than ever lived, ere I could exaggerate suicide, despair, and the horrors that drove young and old to them; or (to vary your own phrase) write "a libel upon Hell."

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES READE.

GARRICK CLUB,

THE PRURIENT PRUDE.

SIR,—There is a kind of hypocrite that has never been effectually exposed, for want of an expressive name. I beg to supply that defect in our language, and introduce to mankind the PRURIENT PRUDE. Modesty in man or woman shows itself by a certain slowness to put a foul construction on things, and also by unobtrusively shunning indelicate matters and discussions. The “PRURIENT PRUDE,” on the contrary, itches to attract attention by a parade of modesty (which is the mild form of the disease), or even by rashly accusing others of immodesty (and this is the noxious form).

“Doctor Johnson,” said a lady, “what I admire in your dictionary is that you have inserted no improper words.”

“What! you looked for them, madam?” said the Doctor.

Here was a “PRURIENT PRUDE,” that would have taken in an ordinary lexicographer.

The wickeder kind of “PRURIENT PRUDE” has committed great ravages in our English railways, where the carriages, you must know, are small and seldom filled. Respectable men found themselves alone with a shy-looking female, addressed a civil remark to her, were accused at the end of the journey of attempting her virtue, and punished unjustly, or else had to buy her off: till at last, as I learn from an article in the Saturday Review, many worthy men refused to sit in a carriage where there was a woman only; such terror had the “PRURIENT PRUDE” inspired in manly breasts. The last of these heroines, however, came to grief; her victim showed fight; submitted to trial, and set the police on her: she proved to be, as any one versed in human nature could have foretold, a woman of remarkably loose morals; and she is at this moment expiating her three P's—Prudery, Prurience, and Perjury—in one of her Majesty's gaols.

Some years ago an English baronet was nearly ruined and separated from his wife by one of these ladies. He was from the country, and by force of habit made his toilet nearer the window than a Londoner would. A "PRURIENT PRUDE" lurked opposite, and watched him repeatedly; which is just what no modest woman would have done once; and, interpreting each unguarded action by the light of her own foul imagination, actually brought a criminal charge against the poor soul. The charge fell to the ground the moment it was sifted; but in the meantime, what agony had the "PRURIENT PRUDE" inflicted on an innocent family!

Unfortunately the "PRURIENT PRUDE" is not confined to the female sex. It is not to be found amongst men of masculine pursuits; but it exists amongst writers. Example: a divorce case, unfit for publication, is reported by all the English journals. Next day, instead of being allowed to die, it is renewed in a leader. The writer of this leader begins by complaining of the courts of law for giving publicity to Filth. —(N.B. the ridiculous misuse of this term, where not filth but crime is intended, is an infallible sign of a dirty mind, and marks the "PRURIENT PRUDE.") After this flourish of prudery, Pruriens goes with gusto into the details, which he had just said were unfit for publication. Take down your file of English journals and you will soon lay your hand on this variety of the "PRURIENT PRUDE." A harmless little humbug enough.

But, as amongst women, so amongst writers, the "PRURIENT PRUDE" becomes a less transparent and more dangerous imposter, when, strong in the shelter of the Anonymous, which hides from the public his own dissolute life and obscene conversation, he reads his neighbour by the light of his own corrupt imagination, and so his prurient prudery takes the form of slander, and assassinates the fair fame of his moral, intellectual, and social superior.

Now the five or six "Prurient Prudes" who defile the American Press, have lately selected me, of all persons, for their victim. They are trying hard to make the American public believe two monstrous falsehoods: first, that they are pure-minded men; secondly, that I am an impure writer.

Of course, if these five or six "Prurient Prudes" had the courage to do as I do, sign their names to their personalities.

their names and their characters would be all the defence I should need. But, by withholding their signatures they give the same weight to their statements that an honest man gives by appending his signature, and compel me, out of respect to the American public, whose esteem I value, to depart from the usual practice of authors in my position, and to honour mere literary vermin with a reply. The case, then, stands thus. I have produced a story called "Griffith Gaunt, or Jealousy." This story has, ever since December, 1865, floated The Argosy, an English periodical, and has been eagerly read in the pages of The Atlantic Monthly. In this tale I have to deal, as an artist and a scholar, with the very period Henry Fielding has described—to the satisfaction of Prurient Prudes; a period in which manners and speech were somewhat blunter than now-a-days; and I have to pourtray a great and terrible passion, Jealousy, and show its manifold consequences, of which even Bigamy (in my story) is one, and that without any violation of probability. Then I proceed to show the misery inflicted on three persons by Bigamy, which I denounce as a crime. In my double character of moralist and artist, I present, not the delusive shadow of Bigamy, but its substance. The consequence is, that instead of shedding a mild lustre over Bigamy, I fill my readers with a horror of Bigamy, and a wholesome indignation against my principal male character, so far as I have shown him. Of course "Griffith Gaunt," like "Hard Cash," is not a child's book, nor a little girl's book: it is an ambitious story, in which I present the great passions that poets have sung with applause in all ages; it is not a boatful of pap; but I am not paid the price of pap. By the very nature of my theme I have been compelled now and then to tread on delicate ground; but I have trodden lightly and passed on swiftly, and so will all the pure-minded men and women who read me. No really modest woman will ever suffer any taint by reading "Griffith Gaunt," unless, indeed, she returns to its perusal, unsexed, and filled with prurient curiosity, by the foul interpretations of the "Prurient Prudes." Then come a handful of scribblers, whose lives are loose and their conversation obscene: they take my text, and read it, not by its own light, but by the light of their own foul imaginations; and, having so defiled it by mixing their own filthy minds with it, they sit in judgment on the compound. To these imposters I say no more. The two words, "Prurient Prude," will soon run round the Union, and render its citizens somewhat less gullible by that class of impostor. One person, however, has slandered me so maliciously and so busily, that I am compelled to notice him individually, the more so as I am about to sue an English weekly for merely quoting him. The editor of a New York weekly called The Round Table has printed a mass of scurrility direct and vicarious to this purport:—

1. That "Griffith Gaunt" is an indecent publication;
2. That it is immoral;
3. That, like other novelists, the author deals in adultery, bigamy, and nameless social crimes;
4. But that, unlike the majority of my predecessors, I side with the crimes I depict;
5. That the modesty and purity of women cannot survive the perusal of "Griffith Gaunt;"
6. That this story was declined by some of the lowest sensational weekly papers of New York, on the ground that they did not dare to undertake its publication.
7. Passing from personal to vicarious slander, he prints the letter of an animal calling itself G. S. H., who suggests that some inferior writer wrote "Griffith Gaunt," and that I lent my name to it for a foreign market, and so he and I combined to swindle the Boston publishers.—This, in England, we call felony.

Now, sir, I have often known some obscure dunce, who had the advantage of concealing his nameless name, treat an esteemed author with lofty contempt in the columns of a journal, and call his masterpiece a sorry production. I myself am well accustomed to that sort of injustice and insolence from scribblers, who could not write my smallest chapter, to save their carcasses from the gallows, and their souls from premature damnation. But the spite and vanity of our inferiors in the great, profound, and difficult art of writing, are generally satisfied by calling us dunces, and bunglers, and coxcombs, and that sort of thing.

In all my experience I never knew the Press guilty of such a crime as the editor of The Round Table has committed. It is a deliberate attempt to assassinate the moral character of an author and a gentleman, and to stab the ladies of his own family to the heart, under pretence of protecting the women of a nation from the demoralizing influence of his pen.

You will see at once that I could not hold any communication with The Round Table or its editor, and I must, therefore, trust to American justice and generosity, and ask leave to reply in respectable columns.

In answer to statements 1, 2, 4, and 5, I pledge the honour of a gentleman that they are deliberate and intentional falsehoods, and I undertake to prove this before twelve honest American citizens, sworn to do justice between man and man.

As to No. 3, I really scarce know what my slanderer means. Griffith Gaunt, under a delusion, commits Bigamy: and of course Bigamy may by a slight perversion of terms be called Adultery. But no truthful person, attacking character, would apply both terms to a single act. Is Bigamy more than Polygamy? And is Polygamy called that, and Adultery too, in every district of the United States?

As to "the nameless social crimes," what does the beast mean? Did he find these in his own foul imagination, or did he find them in my text? If it was in the latter, of course he can point to the page. He shall have an opportunity.

Statement 6, is a lie by way of equivocation. The truth is, that before "Griffith Gaunt" was written, an agent of mine proposed to me to sound some newspaper proprietors, who had hitherto stolen my works, as to whether they would like to buy a story of me, instead of stealing it. I consented to this preliminary question being put, and I don't know what they replied to my agent. Probably the idea of buying, where they had formed a habit of stealing, was distasteful to them. But this you may rely on, that I never submit a line of manuscript to the judgment of any trader whatever, either in England or in America, and never will. Nothing is ever discussed between a trader and me except the bulk and the price. The price is sometimes a high one; but always a fair one, founded on my sales. If he has not the courage to pay it, all the worse for him. If he has, the bargain is signed, and then and not till then, he sees the copy.

I never intrusted a line of "Griffith Gaunt" to an agent. I never sent a line of it across the Atlantic to any human being, except to the firm of Ticknor and Fields: and even to that respectable firm, one of the partners in which is my valued friend, I did not send a line of it until they had purchased of me the right to publish it in the United States. And this purchase was made on the basis of an old standing agreement.

Compare these facts with the impression a miserable prevaricator has sought to create, to wit, that the proprietor of some low journal was allowed to read the manuscript, or unpublished sheets, of "Griffith Gaunt," and declined it on the score of morality.

Statement 7, which accuses me of a literary felony, is a deliberate, intentional, falsehood. The Argosy is sold in New York in great numbers, price sixpence. The editor of The Round Table is aware of this, and has seen "Griffith Gaunt" in it, with my name attached; yet he was so bent on slandering me by hook or by crook, that he printed the letter of G. S. H. without contradiction, and so turned the conjecture of a mere fool into a libel and a lie.

I shall only add that I mean to collar the editor of The Round Table, and drag him and his slanders before a jury of his countrymen. He thinks there is no law, justice, or humanity for an Englishman in the great United States. We shall see.

Pending the legal inquiry, I earnestly request my friends in the United States to let me know who this editor of The Round Table is, and all about him, that so we may meet on fair terms before the jury.

All editors of American journals who have any justice, fair play, or common humanity to spare to an injured stranger, will print this letter, in which one man defends himself against many; and will be good enough to accept my thanks for the same in this writing.

CHARLES READE.

3, ALBERT TERRACE,
HYDE PARK, LONDON.

P.S. I demand as my right the undivided honour of all the insults that have been misdirected against Messrs. Ticknor and Fields, of Boston. Those gentlemen have had no alternative: they could not bow to slander, and discontinue "Griffith Gaunt" in The Atlantic Monthly, without breaking faith with me, and driving their subscribers to The Argosy. The whole credit, and discredit, of "Griffith Gaunt," my masterpiece, belongs to me, its sole author, and original vendor.

SECOND-HAND LIBEL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "GLOBE."

SIR,—You have read my letter to the American Press, cited one paragraph, and perverted that from its true intention, by suppressing its context. By this means you exaggerate my arrogance, and stir the bile of the publishers. I must request you to be more scrupulous, and to print the whole truth. The Round Table had stated that "'Griffith Gaunt' was declined by some of the lowest sensational weekly papers of New York, on the ground that they did not dare to undertake its publication." This was a monstrous piece of insolence; and I had to show a distant public that it must be a falsehood. But this I had no means whatever of doing, except by revealing my real way of treating with traders at home and abroad. You are welcome to blarney the publishers by telling them that artists (penny-a-liners excepted) write for money, but publishers publish for glory. I cannot go quite this length with you, not wanting their advertisements; but still I do not wish to affront these gentlemen without provocation, and so I insist on your printing this explanation, which your own disingenuousness has rendered necessary.

On the 17th October "Griffith Gaunt" was published in three volumes; on the 19th a copy was probably in your hands. On that day you revived and circulated a slander that tends to injure its sale very seriously, and to destroy the personal character of its author: you announced in your columns that "an American critic declares the story to be indecent and immoral; and that, on this point, having vainly attempted to read it, you offer no opinion."

Now it may be very polite of cold hashed mutton to affect a singular contempt for venison: but in your case it is not reasonable; you are familiar with drudgery; you contrive to read dozens of novels that are the very offal of the human mind; ay, and to praise them too. You know why.

Now, advertisements are a fine thing; but justice is a finer, whatever you may think. And justice required of you either to hold your tongue about "Griffith Gaunt," or else to read it.

But even assuming that you really had not the brains to read "Griffith Gaunt" for pleasure, nor yet the self-respect and prudence to wade through it before lending your columns to its defamation, at least you have read my letter to the American press; and, having read that, you cannot but suspect this charge of immorality and indecency to be a libel and a lie. Yet you have circulated the calumny all the same, and suppressed the refutation.

I am afraid the truth is, you have got into your head that the law will allow you to indulge a perverse disposition, by defaming and blackening the moral character of a respected author, provided you use another man's blacking. Pure chimera! The law draws no such distinction. It serves tale-bearers with the same sauce as tale-makers; it protects honest men alike against the originators and the reckless circulators of calumny. Believe me, your only chances to avoid very serious consequences are two: you must either meet me before a jury, and justify the American libel you have Anglicised and circulated; or else you must contradict it at once, and apologize to the man you have wronged. I offer you three days, to read "Griffith Gaunt" and decide upon your course. If at the end of that time, you do not distinctly and categorically state that "Griffith Gaunt" is not an indecent and immoral book—and apologize to its author—I shall sue the proprietor of the Globe, as I am suing the proprietor of the London Review, for composing and printing an American libel with English type, and then publishing and selling it in English columns; in other words, for collecting foreign dirt with English hands, and flinging it upon the personal character of an English citizen.

The editor of the Globe having made public comments on this letter, yet kept the letter private, the writer requests less unscrupulous editors to repair this injustice.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE “TIMES.”

SIR.—The Times of the 24th of August contains a notice of “A Terrible Temptation,” done upon a new plan. It is a careful synopsis of all the main incidents in my story, only my abridger has divested them of every charm. It is rather hard my name should be attached to a bad story told by another man when I have told a goodish one with the same materials; but I console myself by reflecting that the same ingenious process applied to Homer’s Iliad would prove it a contemptible work. There is something more serious, reflecting on me both as a writer and a man, which I cannot leave uncontradicted in columns so powerful as yours. My abridger has said that I have written about things which should not be spoken of, much less written about—alluding to my sketch of Rhoda Somerset—and that innocent girls ought not to be informed on such subjects. He even hints that mothers would do well to forbid my first volume to their unmarried daughters. You must admit, sir, this is a very serious thing to say in print, and very cruel to a writer of my age; then do, please, give me fair play for once, and let me be heard in reply. The character of Rhoda Somerset was not invented by me, but copied from a master hand. It was you who first introduced her, ponies and all, to the public, on the 3rd day of July, 1862, in an admirable letter, headed “Anonyma.” On another occasion you discussed the whole subject, day after day, in leaders and a vast correspondence, so that for one lady who knows about the demi-monde from my pages, twenty know a great deal more from yours. Should this lose you the esteem of my abridger, permit me to offer you, as a small substitute, the thanks of a better judge. You did your duty to the public in 1862, as you had often done it before, and were true to your own invaluable maxim, "Facts must be faced." For 18 years, at least, the journal you conduct so ably has been my preceptor, and the main source of my works—at all events of the most approved. A noble passage in the Times of September 7 or 8, 1853, touched my heart, inflamed my imagination, and was the germ of my first important work, "It is Never Too Late to Mend." That column, a monument of head, heart, and English, stands now dramatized in my pages, and embellishes the work it had inspired. Some years later you put forth an able and eloquent leader on private asylums, and detailed the sufferings there inflicted on persons known to you. This took root in me, and brought forth its fruit in the second volume of "Hard Cash." Later still, your hearty and able, but temperate leaders, upon trades unions and trade outrages incited me to an ample study of that great subject, so fit for fiction of the higher order, though not adapted to the narrow minds of bread-and-butter misses, nor of the criticasters who echo those young ladies' idea of fiction and its limits, and thus "Put Yourself in His Place" was written. Of "A Terrible Temptation," the leading idea came to me from the Times—viz., from the report of a certain trial, with the comments of counsel, and the remarkable judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Byles. The character of Rhoda Somerset I culled from your pages, and having observed with what firmness, yet coldness, you treated that character and topic, I have kept your method in view, and, at all events, tried to imitate it. Whatever warmth I have shown is in the scenes of virtuous love; in the Somerset's scenes I am cold and sarcastic. Up to the period of her repentance how do I treat this character? Do I whitewash the hussy, or make her a well-bred, delicate-minded woman, as your refined and immoral writers would? I present her illiterate, coarse, vain, with good impulses, a bad temper, and a Billingsgate tongue. In close contrast to this unattractive photograph I am careful to place my portrait of an English virgin, drawn in the sweetest colours my rude art can command, that every honest reader may see on which side my sympathies lie, and be attracted to virtue by the road of comparison. Believe me, sir, a thousand innocent girls are at this moment being corrupted by writers of their own sex, with novels instinctively adapted to the female reader, to her excessive sexuality, and her sense of propriety. These writers, being women, know how to work on the former without alarming the latter, and so, by fine degrees and with soft insidious pertinacity, they reconcile their female readers to illicit love, and shed a mild lustre over adultery itself. Yet so destitute of the true critical faculty are the criticasters of the day that these canny corrupters of female youth escape censure ; it has gone astray after a writer in whose hands vice startles and offends, not captivates. My pen has never corrupted a soul ; it never will, it never can, till water shall run uphill.

Should this argument fall into abler hands than an abridger's, I expect to be told, not that it is the duty of all writers to ignore certain vices, and so do their best to perpetuate them, but that many subjects open to the journalist are closed to the novelist. This is true and reasonable. The answer is—journals must, of necessity, report in their small type some crimes and vices quite unfit to be mentioned in a novel ; but that a journalist has any right to put into his leaded type and to amplify, discuss, and dwell upon any subject whatever, and that the poet or the novelist has not an equal right to deal with that subject in fiction, this is monstrous and the mere delusion of a rabid egotism.

Since, therefore, I have taken Anonyma from your hands and have presented her in no voluptuous scenes, and have made her a repulsive character until she repents, no mother need forbid my book to her daughter ; at all events, until she has forbidden her daughters to enter Hyde Park and the Times to enter her drawing-room, and has locked up every Bible on her premises.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant and pupil,

CHARLES READE.

2, ALBERT TERRACE, KNIGHTSBRIDGE,

August 26th, 1871.

SIR,—Those who read the late controversy between the Times and me must, I think, have been surprised and somewhat shocked—if they admire the Times as much as I do—at its rude and ungenerous reply to a courteous letter, in which I taught it that great lesson of superior minds—appreciation. A retort so conceited, so silly, and so rude, entitled me to a reply. I sent a short one; it is suppressed. This is foul play: and, as Englishmen in general abhor foul play, I venture to ask you to give publicity to these few lines, which, mild as they are, the editor of the Times had not the courage to face.

"FACTS MUST BE FACED."

SIR,—My generous tribute to the Times referred to those able men who write in the Times on public questions—not to the small fry, who write about literature because they cannot write literature. I touched my hat to the Tritons of the Times, not to the minnows: yet one of these latter has coolly adopted the compliment, and actually made it a handle for impertinence that outrages truth and common decency. This is base; and I wonder you could be betrayed into lending your name to it. Where gentleman are concerned, appreciation on the one side begets decent civility on the other. I shall not descend to bandy invectives with my inferior, but shall pick his one grain of argument out of his peck of scurrility. I have driven him from his first position, which was, that nobody ought to print anything about Anonyma. Now that he finds who first introduced her to the public, he sings quite another song. "Journals," says he, "deal in such facts as these, but not in fictions." This is a distinction without a difference. It does not matter one straw whether a young lady reads facts about Anonyma, or figments founded on facts, for the effect on her mind is precisely the same in both cases. The distinction is not only muddle-headed, but inapplicable; for the Times has done a little fiction in this thing. Of the letters printed in the Times about the Demi-monde, a good many were written to order by the staff of the Times, though signed "Paterfamilias,"

"A Belgravian Mother," or what not. Now that is fiction—fiction as pure as anything in "A Terrible Temptation." The late Mr. Joseph Addison did mightily affect this form; he wrote himself letters from coquettes and other sprightly correspondents, and so enlivened his didactic columns; for Fiction improves whatever it touches. Your reviewer now hangs to his chimera by one thread. "Ours," says he, "are public duties; his are private." So much for young gentlemen writing about literature with no knowledge of the business. "Private!" Why, my English circulation is larger than that of the Times; and in the United States three publishers have already sold three hundred and seventy thousand copies of this novel—which, I take it, is about thirty times the circulation of the Times in the United States, and nearly six times its English circulation.

Writing for so vast a variety of human beings, for more than one great nation, and for more than one generation, I cannot afford to adopt novel and narrow views of my great art; I cannot consent to make myself, by artificial contraction, smaller than the journalists. The world is big enough for a few creators as well as for a shoal of commentators. I do not howl because two thousand journalists deal, in their leaded type, with Lunacy, Prisons, Trades Unions, Divorce, Murder, Anonyma, and other great facts; and those who aspire to represent so large a body of sensible men, should bridle their egotism, discourage their pitiable jealousy, and cease to howl because five or six masters of Fiction have the judgment and the skill to weave the recorded facts, and published characters, of this great age, into the forms of Art.

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES READE.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN A JUDGE AND A GAOLER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH."

SIR,—At Christmas imagination runs rife; Pantomimes threaten, wherein Wisdom will be kept within bounds by Fancy; and even in your columns I have just read a Dream, and found it interesting. May I then profit by your temporary leniency and intrude into the sacred Telegraph a dialogue? It is imaginary, but not idle: it may do good, and make Power think instead of thinking it thinks—a common but hurtful habit.

SCENE—The Old Bailey.

The Judge. Is the gaoler present?

Mr. Holdfast. Here, my lord.

Judge. I sentence this man to four months' imprisonment, with hard labour: you understand?

Holdfast. Perfectly, my lord. You mean unwholesome labour, as much as he can do and a little more. So then when he falls short, we reduce his diet to increase his strength, since it has proved unequal; this to be continued in a circle, and take his bed every now and then and let him lie on a plank.

Judge. What! hard labour, yet short diet, with the addition of cold at night and broken rest! Why, this is not Detention, it is Destruction—either to man or beast. No, sir, I do not condemn this man to imprisonment for life—he is not a murderer—I give him just four months, no more, no less; and in
